Board of Assessors of the District would be a grave injustice to the taxpayers of the District and deprive them of the right they unanimously asserted they desired when they appeared and demanded an independent Board of Tax Appeals for the District of Columbia.

WM. E. HAYES,
Chairman Taxation Committee, District of Columbia Bar Association.

Mr. Chairman, I point out to Members at this time that the Board of Tax Appeals was created about 2 years ago by the Committee on the District of Columbia. That was done at the instance of repeated requests and demands by the taxpayers of the District that such a Board be set up, because under the old law we had this situation. A man went out and assessed your property, and he fixed the valuation on the property and levied the assessment. Then you appealed from that, and then found that man with other men out of the assessor's office sitting as the board of appeals. It is the opinion of the District of Columbia Committee that there should be some appeal to an independent authority rather than an appeal to the man who fixed the valuation and who had levied the assessment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase and repair of furniture, tools, machinery, material, and books, and apparatus to be used in connection with instruction in manual and vocational training, and incidental expenses connected therewith, including all necessary expenses in connection with the operation, maintenance, and repair of automobiles used in driver-training courses, $70,400, to be immediately available.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 26, line 12, strike out the words "including all" and insert "and for insurance and all other"; and in line 14, after the words "repair of", insert "District-owned or loaned."

Mr. CALDWELL. That is a clarifying amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For textbooks and other educational books and supplies as authorized by the act of January 31, 1930 (46 Stat. 62), including not to exceed $7,000 for personal services, $190,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOREN: Page 27, line 21, strike out all of lines 21 to 24, inclusive.

Mr. BOREN rose.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 6 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make a speech on this subject. The Federal Government does not provide free textbooks for any other students in any other part of the Nation, and I do not believe the Federal Government should provide free textbooks for students in the District of Columbia. At the present time they are providing free textbooks even in the high schools of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman realizes that the District pays over $40,000,000 in taxes, and that this money comes from the taxpayers of the District of Columbia and is not provided for out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BOREN. Just the same, the Federal Government contributes $6,000,000 to the District and pays a portion of this free-textbook cost.

Mr. MAHON. The chairman of the subcommittee advises me that it is required by law to make this appropriation.

Mr. BOREN. I recognize that this item is required by law, but the funds come out of public funds, nevertheless, appropriated by Congress, and I do not feel it is justified.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. There is a total of $48,000,000, and only $6,000,000 is contributed by the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOREN) there were ayes 1 and noes 18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations herein made for the public schools of the District of Columbia shall be used for the free instruction of pupils who dwell outside the District of Columbia: Provided, That this limitation shall not apply to pupils who are enrolled in the schools of the District of Columbia on the date of the approval of this act.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SASSCER: On page 31 strike out all of lines 15 to 20, inclusive.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to strike lines 15 to 20, inclusive, on page 31, from the act. The purpose of those lines is to repeal existing law which permits children whose parents work either in the Government service or in private employment in the District of Columbia, but who live without the District, to be admitted free into the District of Columbia schools. Although, to some extent, this is legislation on an appropriation measure, I did not make a point of order against it, possibly because it is by way of limitation, a point of order might not be well taken.

Briefly, I understand there are some 2,500 children who come into the District schools; that the cost of education of those children is something over $250,000. It may be asked why should those children come in free. I might briefly say that the parents of those children live on the border of the District of Columbia and, speaking for Maryland, I can say that as far as reciprocity is concerned, children of the District of Columbia go free to the Maryland schools. In my own county, just on the border of the District of Columbia, I am informed there are some hundred children who reside in the District of Columbia, in the outlying sections, who attend Maryland schools free. I am sure the same situation is true in Montgomery County, where a great many District of Columbia children go free to the Montgomery County schools.

In addition to that, our great university at College Park, built up now to the point where it stands foremost among those of the Nation, is supported by the taxpayers of Maryland. We permit students from the District of Columbia to attend that university at practically the same cost to Maryland students, and less than the charge made to the students from other States.

I have been in touch with our Maryland government for some years. One of the reasons why that reciprocity was extended was because the children in Maryland, whose parents work in the District of Columbia, go free to the District of Columbia schools. There are seven or eight hundred District of Columbia students who go to College Park at $75 per year less than students from other States, making a total in that one item alone of over $50,000. I feel sure that in addition to the spirit of reciprocity and cooperation prevailing in greater Washington, if we check this down the line and take into consideration the children from the District of Columbia who attend Maryland schools free, and take into consideration the great number who attend the University of Maryland, there cannot be any question about the fairness and justice of this amendment. The parents of these children are not Marylanders necessarily. In that suburban section many citizens of different States reside and retain their residence at home. They work in the Government in the District of Columbia and some bring their children into the District of Columbia. The fact that the Federal Government does appropriate a substantial sum for the District of Columbia should be taken into consideration, also. If you would go out to the District line and see how the Maryland people on their way home are trading at the District stores, you can realize how much Maryland money is spent here. Practically all of their money for clothing, and so forth, is spent in the department stores in the District of Columbia. So you can see it is not only eminently fair because of the money we spend here but Maryland has met its reciprocity by accepting District children into its university and into its own public schools.

I therefore respectfully ask that this reciprocity be not destroyed, and this act repealed by this appropriation bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, on the question of reciprocity I am not sure what the situation is in Maryland, but in the hearings Dr. Ballou was asked about this problem.

As will be found on page 191 of the hearings, he said:

I got a letter just the other day, following a newspaper discussion of this matter, calling attention to the fact that a resident of the District was sending a child to a school in one of the counties of Virginia, and that resident of the District has to pay tuition in that county in Virginia.

District students are not given the same privileges at the University of Maryland that Maryland students are given. Twenty-eight hundred students from Virginia and Maryland are now going to school in the District. It is unfair to burden the people of the District with this additional $265,000. The people who are sending their children to the District are in the upper financial brackets and there is no reason why they could not pay a modest or reasonable sum for that privilege. I think they should.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Do the political subdivisions that are adjacent to the District of Columbia have any law whereby they might repay the District the amount of the tuition that might be charged for these children attending District schools?

Mr. CALDWELL. I am not certain as to that.

Mr. DONDERO. We have such a law in my State of Michigan. I am quite familiar with it.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Is provision made whereby parents, if they want to send their children to the District schools, may do so upon payment of tuition and mileage?

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, yes. The school department is authorized, under the language of this limitation, to accept such students upon payment of reasonable tuition—whatever may be fixed. I may say further that this does not apply to children now enrolled but to future enrollees.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Is there any provision whereby Members of Congress have to pay for the education of their children in the District?

Mr. CALDWELL. I am not sure about that.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Is it not true that their children are educated without any charge at all?

Mr. CALDWELL. I believe that is true.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Why should not they pay?

Mr. CALDWELL. Their children should be treated the same as the children of any other residents of the District; they are educated in the District schools whether the parents reside here temporarily or permanently.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. In the past the House has passed this item and it has been fought on the other side of the Capitol Considerable opposition has always come from Representatives from neighboring States. I do not feel that the taxpayers in my State of Nebraska, who are ready to pay a portion of the Government's $6,000,000 contribution to the general expenses of running the District, should be taxed for the tuition of pupils from Maryland and Virginia who participate in these benefits here.

The schools of the District of Columbia are perhaps the finest schools in the United States; they are model schools. People come from all over the country endeavoring to send their children to the District schools. I do not blame the people in Maryland and Virginia for endeavoring to secure this fine free tuition, but I do not want my taxpayers in Nebraska to contribute to the education of the children of Maryland and Virginia, who must pay tuition should they send their children to other States.

Dr. Ballou, Superintendent of Schools in the District of Columbia, states that there is absolutely no reciprocity so far as tuition is concerned between Maryland and Virginia. I do not blame my colleagues from Virginia and Maryland for trying to retain this advantage for their people. They are always fighting against the dropping of this privilege, which costs from $250,000 to $265,000, which should be their own responsibility.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. SASSCER. So far as reciprocity is concerned in the case of Maryland University, does the gentleman realize that there is no land-grant school in the District of Columbia, and that for their vocational training District students go to the University of Maryland absolutely free and the others go there on a reduced basis?

Mr. CALDWELL. All I know is what the superintendent of schools told us at the hearings.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired; all time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SASSCER) there were—ayes 8, noes 29.

So the motion to the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the pay and allowances of officers and members of the Metropolitan Police force, in accordance with the act entitled "An act to fix the salaries of the Metropolitan Police force, the United States Park Police force, and the Fire Department of the District of Columbia" (43 Stat. 174–175), as amended by the act of July 1, 1930 (46 Stat. 839–841), including one captain, who shall be property clerk, and the present acting sergeant in charge of police automobiles, who shall have the rank and pay of a sergeant, $2,924,280.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHULTE: Page 35, line 20, strike out "$2,924,280" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,948,505"; and on page 68, line 7, strike out "$516,050" and insert in lieu thereof "$520,325."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this amendment for the purpose of increasing the Police Department of the District of Columbia by 25 men. Of course it means an increase in the Budget of $42,500. The men are started off at a salary of $1,900 a year, which is the salary paid to rookies. Now, let me state the reason for this amendment.

We have been reading in the newspapers constantly of hold-ups, burglaries, the snatching of purses, and other petty crimes. I do not mind saying to you that Washington is fast becoming known as the petty-crime center of the universe. Do you know that just this morning on the Capitol Grounds there was a hold-up? On the Capitol Ground of the Nation! Certainly this is becoming serious when they are so brazen as to attempt a hold-up on the Capitol Grounds. When the matter of robberies is called to the attention of the major of police he continues to say that he is short of police, he has not enough men.

Let me say to the Members of the House that the major has some justification for saying that very thing, and I believe we all agree that he does not have enough men, so certainly he is right in advancing that sort of an argument because of the fact that they are constantly draining his department. Men are taken to the White House to accompany the President to the train and to receive the President when he comes back and they perform other functions such as guarding the embassies, the legations, and a great many other duties they do not have to perform in other cities, but must do here in the District of Columbia. Last year there were 4,000 man-hours used in that type and kind of service.

I appreciate the fact that the Police Department in the District here is entitled to be streamlined and that there are some ills and faults with the Police Department that should be corrected. For instance, 14 men from the Police Department, drawing a salary of $2,400 a year each, are assigned as hack inspectors. They are the fellows who go out and ask the hack driver if he has a license. They see if he has four wheels on his taxicab and perform services of that kind. Those are not the duties of a policeman, and this service, I maintain, should be placed in the Traffic Department under the supervision of Mr. Van Duzer, and certainly a big saving could be effected right here in this department. Instead of paying policemen $2,400 a year, others could do it for $1,800 a year, so that would give us about 14 more men to do police work. Those are some of the things we have to contend with—and again here is another incident. There are 10 or 12 men from the Police Department assigned to the A. B. C. Board. Those men are charged against the Police Department. They go around to see that the taverns have licenses, they see that there are no violations going on in these taverns, and again I say that does not belong to the Police Department. This work again should be done by men hired by the A. B. C. Board, and should they have any trouble they could call on the man on the beat. The man on the beat should be able to take care of that situation.

If we could get the Commissioners to cooperate with the people of the District of Columbia and cooperate with the various heads of departments, we would not have any argument in the District of Columbia for the vote and suffrage. But we do not have that now. I hope when the President makes his next appointment to the District Commission that he will select someone who has no connection whatsoever with the District Building or any of its affiliates, someone who really has the District of Columbia and its people at heart. I am frank to say, if he does appoint a man of that type, we can correct this situation very quickly, and I am serious when I make that statement. I have been a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia for the past 8 years, and I feel that I have gained quite a bit of experience by being a member of that committee and that I can speak authoritatively.

Mr. Chairman, in going over the Police Department and its various subdivisions I can readily understand why the major should have an additional 25 men. He has been working the men from 8 o'clock in the morning until 12 at night. He has to do that because of the fact that the crime wave is here. At least that is what the newspapers have called it, and certainly it has been very serious in the last 2 weeks. It subsides one night, then breaks out again the next night. Your constituents and mine have probably had the same experience that I had the misfortune to go through. I do not want to face these guns. It is not a pleasant thing to look into the business end of a gun and be told to surrender your money. I am frank to state that around 1,400 or 1,425 police are not sufficient in a city of 629,000 people, when they are assigned to other bureaus, while still being charged to the Police Department. I hope that at some time or other with District Commissioners whose sole interests are in the District of Columbia and its welfare this thing may be ironed out to the satisfaction of everyone concerned, and I want to suggest to the Commissioners now to have the police who are assigned to the hack inspectors and the A. B. C. Board that they be returned back to the Police Department for which they were hired, and then hire men who are paid but $1,800 a year to do this clerical work that is to be done in these agencies.

Mr. Chairman, I hope my amendment will be agreed to, which will provide $42,500 for an additional 25 policemen to be used for the prevention of crime and hold-ups in the District of Columbia.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, unfortunately, the number of police does not always mean efficiency with reference to a police department. There are 133 Capitol police up here on the Hill; and if there was a hold-up on Capitol Hill this morning, it was not due to a lack of police. Certainly if the same proportion of police were employed all over the city of Washington, it would be quite impossible to pay all of them. That is not where the difficulty lies. The remedy is in having the Police Department do the job as it should be done on the Hill and in Washington.

Taking 12 comparable cities in the United States, Washington has more policemen in proportion to population than 9 of those cities. There are only 3 of them that have more.

Your committee has gone into this very carefully. The amount in the amendment would exceed the Budget estimate. Also, Washington, in addition to having more policemen than most cities of the United States in proportion to population, has for its protection 72 Park Police, 133 Capitol Police, and 60 members of the Secret Service. Every building in Washington has its custodial guard and, as you know, hundreds and hundreds of men are used in that capacity, and they are, in a certain sense, policemen. The committee allowed the Budget estimate. As I stated, our committee has gone into this very carefully, and as far as numbers are concerned Washington is better off than most cities. We see no reason to increase it, and we hope you will support the action of the committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I know the gentleman and the members of the Subcommittee on District Appropriations have considered this item carefully, as they have all other items. I am wondering if they realized in estimating the population of the District of Columbia that there are hundreds of thousands of persons who are here every day who are not counted in the regular population?

Mr. O'NEAL. Yes. I think the purpose of the guards and the custodians in the Government buildings, which these people frequent, is one reason we have so many guards, and they are there for the protection of the visiting public.

Mr. SCHULTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SCHULTE. I appreciate the fact we have 100 or more police around the Capitol, and that there are hundreds employed in the various Government buildings, but may I say to the gentleman that those guards are not allowed out of the buildings. They do not patrol the streets, the highways, or the byways, and that is where most of our petty crime is being committed today. One of the Members said to me, "Frankly, I am afraid to go out on the streets at night, and I am even afraid to drive my car."

Mr. O'NEAL. We have given the Police Department an increase every year, practically. It was increased by 25 last year. There are 1,400 police in Washington, which is 2.2 to every 1,000 of population.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CALDWELL. May I remind the gentleman that in the hearings, it developed that 14 members of the uniformed force are now being used throughout the city to inspect various buildings, and determine whether or not occupational licenses should be paid.

Mr. O'NEAL. That is true.

Mr. CALDWELL. They have taken 14 members of the police force out of circulation, and put them on another job.

Mr. SCHULTE. I grant that.

Mr. O'NEAL. The problem is to use what they have to better advantage. The committee went into this very carefully. I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, I am going to support the committee, as I am expected to do, but I do want to say that the kind and, I may say, the adequacy of the police force on Capitol Hill has been, at times, a source of no little distress to me. I am pleased that these boys have these jobs, as I know that nearly all of them go to school. However, we all know that when war comes in any country in the world a great many people lose their reason. I have thought for a long time that especially in times like these, in view of the importance of this building and its occupants, the Capitol Police ought to be supplemented in some fashion by men selected in the same way, and required to have the same physical and mental qualifications as the police in the average metropolitan center. I should like to know what the gentleman thinks of this idea.

Mr. O'NEAL. The gentleman is referring to the Capitol Police?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am.

Mr. O'NEAL. The gentleman is asking my personal opinion?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I know the gentleman has gone into matters like this, and I have not.

Mr. O'NEAL. With 133 police on Capitol Hill, as Members of Congress we certainly should give more attention to their selection, training, and discipline; because my observation has been that it is anything but a trained, soldierly, efficient outfit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHULTE) there were—ayes 6, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For personal services, $148,145, including not to exceed $1,265 for the salary of one part-time physician to be paid at the rate of $3,800 per annum.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have been impressed and oppressed by the fact that notwithstanding we like to believe that we are 435 representatives of the intelligence, the virtue, and the wisdom of the country, we neglect to do some things with respect to our membership and with regard to our friends on this floor which in any other body of this size would be deprecated by any of us. We come here in the morning and see that the flag is at half-staff, a signal that one has gone whom we have "loved long since and lost a while." Someone has died.

We go along about our business here and pass a resolution at the end of the day's work, and then adjourn out of respect to that Member, for whom we have respect and regard but for whom we show neither respect nor regard, by our insistence upon attending to trivial or important material matters and things incident to the day's work, utterly and hypocritically disregarding him, his death, and our loss. This should give us pause.

There is something more than the conideration of dollars and cents in living this life, else Socrates was right when he said: "The happiest man is he who is born dead."

I rise at this moment, sentimentally, you may say—but if life is worth living, it is because of the sentiment that is found in it—to suggest to you that today in charge of this bill is one of the most able, efficient, and conscientious men who ever sat on this floor since I have known anything about it [applause], and my history goes back to the days when I was secretary to my father in 1909. I am speaking about a man who has had the courage to stand and to bear a terrific personal burden, but who has never imposed it upon any of us; a man who comes in here today after having announced publicly that he would never again seek to be a candidate for the office of Congressman but who privately, and I do not know but that he may have done so publicly, has stated that in taking the position as chairman, as he has, of this subcommittee he would undertake to leave to his successor a slate as clean as he could wipe it. I refer to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL]. By his determination not again to be a candidate for Congress we have sustained a loss immeasurable.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completely furnishing and equipping the Southwest health center, $20,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to inquire of the chairman of the subcommittee about an item in connection with the Southwest health center. I do not speak now in any critical vein, but I believe that perhaps a little fuller explanation might be given than that which is carried in the report. I notice you have eliminated the proposal of the Budget for $13,000, which was recommended to be used for the purchase of a site for the health center in Southwest Washington. I quote from the report, as follows:

The committee recommend $20,000 for furnishing and equipping the new Southwest health center instead of $21,000 as proposed by the Budget, and has eliminated the Budget proposal for $13,000 to be used to purchase a site for a health center in Southwest Washington. The committee are of the opinion that this proposal should be deferred until the school-replacement program is undertaken, at which time one or more sites ideally located for this purpose will be available without additional cost to the District.

May I ask the gentleman when he believes the school-replacement program will make available a site which can be used for this purpose?

Mr. CALDWELL. As the gentleman knows, we are not able to make any definite prediction, but it was the feeling of the committee, and of all those with whom we talked, that within the next 1, 2, or 3 years there would be a sufficient consolidation and replacement of the old schools to provide a site that would be entirely suitable for this purpose.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I wish to see these health centers established as quickly as possible where they are needed in Washington. With this explanation of the chairman, I feel that I have no opposition to the deletion of this item.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance, under the jurisdiction of the Board of Public Welfare (of a suitable place in a building entirely separate and apart from the house of detention for the reception and detention of children under 18 years of age arrested by the police on charge of offense against any laws in force in the District of Columbia, or committed to the guardianship of the Board, or held as witness, or held temporarily, or pending hearing, or otherwise, including transportation, food, clothing, medicine, and medicinal supplies, rental, repair and upkeep of buildings, fuel, gas, electricity, ice, supplies, and equipment, and other necessary expenses, including not to exceed $20,920 for personal services, $39,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: On page 47, line 11, strike out the parenthesis and insert a comma.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For current work of repairs to streets, avenues, roads, and alleys, including the reconditioning of existing gravel streets and roads; for cleaning snow and ice from streets, sidewalks, cross walks, and gutters in the discretion of the Commissioners; and including the purchase, exchange, maintenance, and operation of non-passenger-carrying motor vehicles used in this work, $922,500, of which amount $97,500 shall be available exclusively for snow-removal purposes, $18,000 thereof to be immediately available for reimbursement to the appropriation from which expenditures for such purposes have heretofore been made, and not to exceed $37,500 thereof to be available for the procurement of snow-removal equipment: Provided, That appropriations contained in this act for highways, sewers, city refuse, and the Water Department shall be available for snow removal when specifically and in writing ordered by the Commissioners: Provided further, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, should they deem such action to be to the advantage of the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized to purchase a municipal asphalt plant at a cost not to exceed $30,000: Provided further, That not exceeding $15,000 of the foregoing appropriation shall be available for the preparation of plans, working drawings, and specifications for the construction of an underpass in the line of Sixteenth Street NW., at Scott Circle, including necessary changes in surface and underground structures within public property areas now occupied by roadways, sidewalks, walkways, parking and park reservations: Provided further, That upon the completion and approval of such plans by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the said Commissioners are authorized to submit the project as a Federal-aid highway project to the Public Roads Administration under the provisions of the Federal Aid Highway Act of June 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 633), and upon approval of such project by the Public Roads Administration the Commissioners are authorized to construct such underpass and perform such necessary incidental work and pay the cost thereof from the appropriation contained in this act for Federal-aid highway projects and the District's allocation of funds by the Public Roads Administration authorized by the said Federal Aid Highway Act: Provided further, That the necessary transfer of jurisdiction of public land and the relocation of monuments is authorized and directed under the provisions of the Land Transfer Act of May 20, 1932 (47 Stat. 161): And provided further, That the Commissioners are authorized to employ necessary engineering and other professional services, by contract or otherwise, without reference to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5), the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and civil-service requirements.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against all of the paragraph beginning at line 23, page 72, the last three lines, and all of page 73, and lines 1 and 2, on page 74. I make the point of order that this is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the committee is disposed very promptly to concede that the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. No part of this appropriation shall be available for any expense for or incident to the issuance of congressional tags except to those persons set out in the act of December 19, 1932 (47 Stat. 750), including the Speaker and the Vice President.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VAN ZANDT: On page 88, after line 5, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 10. No part of any appropriation contained in this act or authorized hereby to be expended shall be used to pay the compensation of any officer or employee of the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia unless such person is a citizen of the United States or a person in the service of the United States or the District of Columbia on the date of the approval of this act who, being eligible for citizenship, had theretofore filed a declaration of intention to become a citizen or who owes allegiance to the United States."

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will yield to me, I may say that it is my information that there is no one employed by the District or under this appropriation who is not a citizen; but if the gentleman insists, I see no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAYBURN] having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMASON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9102, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, 1941, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment; if not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the bill may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent the Speaker pro tempore appointed the following conferees: Mr. WHITE of Idaho, Mr. HILL, and Mr. HAWKS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] is recognized for 20 minutes.

CENSUS QUESTIONS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, there appeared in the public press on March 26 a statement that the Census Bureau would have available a 5-percent sample of its population enumeration, which would be published during the summer and that the total number of the unemployed might be compiled before the election.

That statement challenges my attention. The implication that any reasonable person can possibly draw from such an announcement on the part of the Census Bureau is that it might have a direct relation or a direct bearing on the coming election next November. If such is not the correct conclusion, if that is not a reasonable interpretation of such an announcement, why does the Census Bureau single out the one subject, the unemployed, to be announced before the election?

That announcement standing alone may not be impressive enough to challenge the attention of the people if it were not associated with certain questions to be asked by an army of 130,000 census enumerators who are to begin their work next week.

The census of 1940 has been given wide publicity. The attention of the whole Nation has been drawn to the fact that the people were to be subjected to questioning heretofore unknown to the people of the United States.

A resolution was introduced in the Senate during this session of Congress by a distinguished Senator from the State of New Hampshire, calling upon that historic legislative body to express itself in opposition to questions relating to the income of the people and to instruct the Bureau of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce, Hon. Harry Hopkins, that it was their judgment that such questions relating to income should be deleted. A hearing on this resolution was held by a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and full opportunity given for the proponents and opponents of that resolution to state their views.

After the hearing the committee reported it favorably to the Senate, but no further action has been taken.

I introduced an identical resolution in this House on February 26, being House Resolution 397, and which provides as follows:

Whereas section 4 of the act of June 18, 1929 (providing for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses), provides that "* * * the fifteenth and subsequent censuses shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to irrigation, to drainage, to distribution, to unemployment, and to mines,"; and

Whereas the act of August 11, 1939 (providing for a national census of housing), extends the scope of the population inquiry of the Sixteenth Decennial Census to include the obtaining of information with respect to dwelling structures and dwelling units in the United States; and

Whereas neither of the acts aforementioned nor any other act of Congress authorizes the officers and employees of the United States charged with the duty of taking the Sixteenth Decennial Census to make inquiries with respect to income; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the absence of authority to make inquiries with respect to income, questions numbered 32 and 33 on the forms prepared by the Bureau of the Census to be used by the enumerators in taking the Sixteenth Census are as follows:

"Amount of money, wages, or salary received (including commissions)." (1939.)

"Did this person receive income of $50 or more from sources other than money, wages, or salary?" (1939); and

Whereas no jurisdiction can exist for officers and employees of the United States to lawfully arrogate to themselves the power to make unauthorized inquiries into the private affairs of citizens; and

Whereas it is particularly dangerous for officers and employees of the United States to abuse their authority in cases where citizens may tolerate such abuse of authority because of their fear of being prosecuted criminally; therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the Director of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce should immediately cause to be deleted from the population schedule proposed to be used in taking the sixteenth decennial census inquiries Nos. 32 and 33 now appearing upon such proposed schedule.

Little opportunity has been presented for the Congress to express itself in relation to this new form of inquisition into the private affairs of the people. We all know that at this late date no action will be taken, but the Bureau of the Consus, after proceedings were instituted in this Congress and after the resolution had been favorably reported, apparently believing that its position was untenable in insisting that questions 32 and 33 should be asked; and, undoubtedly, believing it had no legal right to ask the questions relating to income, and that it had gone beyond the scope of the law, resorted to the strategy adopted and known to the legal profession as "confession and avoidance." Confessing that the Bureau had no legal right to inquire into the income of the people and avoiding the issue by permitting the people to answer the questions in private without divulging their income to the enumerators but setting forth their income on a private slip of paper and sealing it in an envelope.

If the Bureau of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce had had any legal right whatever to inquire and snoop into the incomes of the people, they would not have retreated nor used this subterfuge to obtain the information.

The statute under which this census is to be taken clearly sets forth seven subjects to which inquiry can be made, namely, population, irrigation, agriculture, drainage, distribution, unemployment, and mines. It is strictly a statute of limitation. It is inclusive in the number of subjects listed and it is exclusive of all other subjects. No one can read into the law what is not there and nowhere in the statute is the subject of income mentioned. If Congress had intended, when it passed the law in 1929, that the income of the people should be a subject of inquiry, it would have said so. But having failed to include that subject no one, not even a bureau or a department of the Government, has any right to assume authority for making inquiry regarding a subject which concerns the private affairs of the people. Such dictatorial and bureaucratic procedure and assumption of authority is one way to undermine the guaranteed rights of a free people and as Washington once predicted, "It means the eating away of the coast line of our national existence."

Now I desire to return to the subject that the Bureau of the Census deems so important that the information to be obtained should be published before election and that is the subject of the unemployed.

I have in my possession a copy or sample questionnaire issued by the Bureau of the Census relating to the population schedule. I also have in my possession a copy of the instructions delivered to this vast army of 130,000 enumerators.

Question 21 to be asked is as follows:

Was this person at work for pay or profit in private or nonemergency Government work during week of March 24–30? Yes or No.

Questions 22, 23, 24, and 25 are not to be asked if the answer is "Yes" to question 21. Question 21, above quoted, looks innocent enough standing alone, but when it is associated with the instructions sent out by the Bureau of the Census to the enumerators it becomes an inquiry not only to arouse suspicion but one that challenges the good faith and the proper intent of the Bureau of the Census in obtaining the information. What is the meaning of the words "at work" as interpreted by the Bureau of the Census?

If question 21 is answered "Yes or No," in accordance with the instructions placed in the hands of the enumerators, it will result in an inaccurate, unreliable, and untruthful census in regard to the number of unemployed.

I quote the instructions issued in regard to this subject found on pages 50 and 51 of Instructions to Enumerators, section 498 (b) and section 501 (b); and page 52, (d), section 498:

Enter "Yes" also for any person who worked during the week at unpaid family work as defined below.

Enter "Yes" for a person with a business of his own (such as a store owner, a radio-repair man, a contractor, or a peddler) who operated his business, that is, who attempted to sell his wares or to obtain orders, even though he may not have made any sales or performed any services during the week.

Section 501 (d), page 52, Instructions to Enumerators:

Enter "Yes" for each person who worked for pay or profit in his or her own home at any time during the week, as for example, a woman who took in laundry, or who made artificial flowers that she intended to sell, or did sewing at home for a shop or clothing factory.

In answering question 21, which is subtle and deceptive in the information it seeks to elicit when related to the instructions given, it might be well to give in full not only question 21 on the population schedule of the census blank but also to include questions 22, 23, 24, and 25, which are as follows:

Question No. 22:

If not, was he at work on, or assigned to public emergency work (W. P. A., N. Y. A., C. C. C., etc.), during week of March 24–30? Yes or No.

Question No. 23:

Was this person seeking work? Yes or No.

Question No. 24:

If not seeking work, did he have a job, business, etc.? Yes or No.

Question No. 25:

Indicate whether engaged in home housework (H), in school (S), unable to work (U), or other (Ot).

The first consideration in the study of these questions, if the answer to question 21 is "Yes," the other four are not asked. Bearing in mind the instructions given to the enumerators, let us clearly understand what the Census Bureau believes to be a person "at work." Let us make it understandable. If you worked for pay or profit at any private or nonemergency Government work, regardless of the nature of that work or the amount of money you received during the week of March 24 to 30, 1940, you were employed. In other words, if you were out trying to peddle razor blades, shoelaces, flavoring extracts, although really unemployed, or if you took out the ashes for a neighbor for pay, shoveled the snow from the sidewalks for pay, washed the windows in a store that week for pay, even though you had never done it before nor be offered the job thereafter, you would be employed. And you would also be employed whether or not you sold any razor blades, flavoring extract, or other articles; and the same is true if your wife made an effort to make a sale—she would be employed. If through sheer necessity she took in the first bundle of laundry or did a little sewing at home for some shop or factory, she would be employed; or if she made a few artificial flowers which she intended to sell, even though she was not successful in selling a single flower, she would be listed as employed, or, in the words of the census, "at work."

The same applies to any person 14 years old or over. If you or any member of your family 14 years old or over worked at anything for pay or profit, including unpaid family work, such as helping out at the little newsstand, and so forth, regardless of whether you received any money or not, and if you did, regardless of the amount received, you or they were employed.

Questions 22, 23, and 24 would give the information necessary: Was this person on emergency work? Was this person seeking work? or Did this person have a job?

Let us look at it from another angle. How many people who are, in truth, unemployed will be required to answer "yes" to question No. 21? Who of us, if unemployed, would not try to peddle something or get an odd job here or there in order to get the barest of necessities? Who of us would not cut cordwood for a wealthy neighbor in the North country so that the money would not be called charity, or who of us would not wash the windows of the rich man's home in the Southland for the same reason? Yet all this time we are really unemployed.

Remember that the enumerator is the sole judge of what he will enter upon the schedule; second, that the person furnishing the information is not permitted to see the entries made; third, that this unpropitious question, No. 21, will require an answer of "yes" from untold numbers of persons who are in fact unemployed; fourth, that a "Yes" in answer to this question causes the other employment questions to go unasked; and, last but by no means least, the natural temptation of the enumerator to have done with it. Question No. 21 looms large and foreboding.

Question No. 21 is dangerous. If it is not removed from the census schedules, there may be 1,000,000, 2,000,000, or even 3,000,000 less unemployed people to talk about in the coming Presidential campaign.

Untruthful replies: You have a right not only to an answer, but to a truthful answer. Do not accept any statement that you believe to be false. Where you know that the answer is incorrect, enter upon the schedule the correct answer as nearly as you can ascertain it.

This instruction, above quoted, gives the enumerator a free hand to enter upon the schedule any answer which he, the enumerator, thinks is right. The supposition or assumption that the enumerator can answer the question better than the citizen questioned is preposterous and should not be permitted. Let me quote further from form PA–1, a sentence contained in paragraph 21:

Be particularly careful that no person is reading the entries you are making or the entries you have made for other households.

In other words, the person being questioned has no guarantee, even though he is truthful in every detail, that the enumerator is putting it down in the book right, because he is not permitted to see that it is done right. Remember this instruction because it is exceedingly important.

Questions 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 covering the employment situation are cunningly and ingeniously framed and when asked in their chronological order as per strict instructions set forth in PA–1, page 50, paragraph 496—present a unique picture of an attempt to show that there are a great many less unemployed people in the country than is actually the case.

It must be obvious to every thinking citizen that the enumerator is not himself entitled to anything, as his right, except to ask the questions contained in the questionnaire and to receive and record the citizen's answers thereto. If the enumerators followed this instruction they will have been authorized to set themselves as the judges of the integrity of the citizens, as the judges of the truthfulness of the citizens' answers, and the result of the census will be an inaccurate and unreliable mixture of what the citizens say is true and what the census enumerators decided to put in because they thought it was true. Any enumerator who might not choose to believe some citizen would, under his instruction, be authorized to disregard the citizen's answers and to put in such answers as the enumerator might believe to fit the particular case.

A very grave danger lies here. When the questionnaire reaches Washington, if some official should investigate and should determine that some answer was incorrect, and should undertake to invoke the penalty of fine or imprisonment against the citizen, how would any man or woman be able to prove that the enumerator had answered the question according to his belief, instead of according to the facts as represented by the citizen?

There is not time enough to touch on all the dangers involved in the way the 1940 decennial census is to be conducted. Suffice it to say, however, that attempts never heretofore dreamed of are being made to ignore the Bill of Rights, to defy the Constitution, to override the liberties of the citizens, and to set up a precedent of arbitrary regulation, and then to endeavor to invoke the penalties prescribed by the Congress for failure to answer proper questions in order that the bureaucrats may compel the answering of questions not contemplated by the Congress when it passed the law. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not true that at every 10-year period, when the census is taken, new questions have always been used to cover the new conditions that have arisen in the meantime?

Mr. DONDERO. I have no information on the subject that new questions have been asked, but this census is to be taken under the 1929 law, and the questions that I complain about were not included in the census of 1930.

Mr. KELLER. But, as a matter of fact, I think the gentleman knows, because I have a very high regard for his intelligence, and ordinarily for his judgment, that what I have suggested is true—that every time we have included new questions from the very First Census until the last one.

Mr. DONDERO. When they are authorized by law, yes; but the 1929 act only includes seven subjects, and "income" is not one of them. It is a statute of limitation.

Mr. KELLER. One of the most important things we have to consider at this time is the matter of national income.

Mr. DONDERO. Let me say to my able friend from Illinois that if the income of the people is an important question, why does not the Government of the United States now divulge the information it has concerning every person in this Nation with an income of $1,000 or more?

Mr. KELLER. Unfortunately, it has not that information to the extent that we must have it, and this information which we are asking for will go much more fully into it than has been done before. It does seem to me that we ought to dig in and find out what the national income is to be in this Nation, because without it we cannot intelligently discuss the questions that are facing us at the present time, in my judgment. Why not have it done? The gentleman does not object to answering that, does he?

Mr. DONDERO. Does the gentleman mean the question of income?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. I do not, for the reason that the Government already has the information in regard to my income.

Mr. KELLER. If it did not have it, you would not object to it?

Mr. DONDERO. I would object to it unless the Congress authorizes it. It is an unauthorized question as it stands under the present law.

Mr. KELLER. As a matter of fact, have not the officials of the Census Bureau always had authority to make whatever questions they really found necessary to bring out the facts in the case?

Mr. DONDERO. Oh, I think not. I do not think my able friend from Illinois believes that, unless the Census Bureau is authorized by Congress to do so.

Mr. KELLER. From the very first time to this last census it has been within the discretion of the officials to ask whatever questions they saw fit.

Mr. DONDERO. I must disagree with any such conclusion as that. They do not have the right to ask a single question not authorized by Congress.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks there is any reason why a snooping enumerator could not obtain the information contained in the answers made in confidence and put it in an envelope, by just opening that envelope if he wants to, and then if it is of value to him, from a neighborhood gossip standpoint, putting the name of the person who contributed that envelope on the outside of the envelope?

Mr. DONDERO. Well, I think the method now employed to obtain the information regarding income will not suffice, will not be accurate, and will be entirely unreliable, and it is not authorized by law. That is my objection to it.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I do not want to have the gentleman misunderstand me.

Mr. DONDERO. That would be possible, as the gentleman suggests, of course.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Absolutely. My only opposition to this is—and I do not want to be misunderstood—from the standpoint of one who comes from a rural State and who knows how widely disseminated all information is, notwithstanding the law and the prohibitions contained in it, with respect to GEORGE DONDERO'S business if he lives in Northfield, Vt. Everybody will know it overnight. I do not think it is anybody's business, and if large incomes are to be advertised and small incomes are to be advertised, I do not take any exception to that, but I am opposed to this great Government of the United States getting down to the basis of a missionary meeting—gossip society.

Mr. DONDERO. Of course, I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that if they did know my business they would be surprised how little it is.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does the gentleman know that the National Association of Merchants has made a special request that the Census Bureau compile the very information he criticizes?

Mr. DONDERO. I have heard that discussed before the Senate committee, and I wonder why they want to know how much a man's salary might be below $1,000 when the Internal Revenue Department already has it for every person in the Nation above $1,000.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does not the gentleman think that if we now had the information we are seeking to obtain in the coming census whereby we could make comparisons down throughout the length of time this Government has been in operation that it would be invaluable in the consideration of the development of the country, legislative trends, and trends of business development?

Mr. DONDERO. That is a matter open to argument and long discussion. There is no authority for asking or making inquiry for such information at the present time.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. Certainly.

Mr. HEALEY. If I understand the gentleman correctly in his reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], he said Congress has directly and inflexibly stated the questions that may be asked by an enumerator of the census.

Mr. DONDERO. No. I answered the gentleman's question in this way: Congress has passed a law on the subjects about which inquiry can be made, and that income is not one of them.

Mr. HEALEY. There is, of course, much room for discussion on the part of the authorities charged with taking the census as to the type of question that will conform with the subject matter.

Mr. DONDERO. To answer the gentleman, the only reason the Census Bureau thinks it has a right to ask the questions on income is because it claims that income is akin to population. There is not a Member in this House but can think of more intimate and delicate questions more closely related to the subject of population than income.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] is recognized for 10 minutes.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], and myself, members of the Special Committee to Investigate the National Labor Relations Board may have 10 days in which to file minority views in connection with the majority report which is to be submitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of flood control and navigation in the Red River Valley, a speech I made recently over the radio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

COAST DEFENSES

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to use all the time allotted to me, but I want to direct the attention of the House to the thought that there are certain aspects of national defense to which we have not, perhaps, given close enough attention. One of these is coast defense. Today I introduced a resolution, which is entirely local in character, calling upon the Secretary of War to report to the House of Representatives concerning, first, the nature and adequacy of existing measures of defense on the coast of southern California against hostile attack; second, what, if any, critical shortages in personnel or equipment for the United States Army exists which might jeopardize a successful defense of the coast of southern California; third, the scope of existing harbor-defense projects and the adequacy of such projects when completed to provide a reasonable defense of the harbors of such coast; and, fourth, the present stage of completion of existing harbor-defense projects in southern California and the policy of the War Department as to their completion. This is entirely local in character, but it is my hope that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs may consider this matter of sufficient importance to broaden the resolution to include the entire coast of the United States.

When the War Department officials or any other department officials come before the Appropriations Committee they may testify voluntarily only within the limits of the budget which is under consideration. Consequently the information of record in the committee hearings is likely to be incomplete. It is incomplete unless some member of the committee takes it upon himself to make a deeper inquiry by questioning the departmental witness beyond the scope of the budget.

I have introduced this resolution not in any sense of alarm, but because I am sure that we do not have full and complete information on our coast defenses, and certainly our coast defenses are our second line of defense. I am particularly interested in adequate defense for the coast of southern California because I live there and I am certain that the present defenses are inadequate to prevent even a raid, let alone a vigorous attack. I do not anticipate any raid or attack, but the best insurance is a good defense posture.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Has the gentleman made a similar request of the Navy Department?

Mr. HINSHAW. No; I have not. I am thinking particularly of the military aspect of the coast defenses. The Hepburn committee made a complete report concerning the naval aspect of defenses all over the United States and its Territories and island possessions.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Does the gentleman think you can get the Army and the Navy to agree on what is adequate defense for southern California?

Mr. HINSHAW. Of course, I do not know. However, there is between the Navy and Army what is called the joint board. The General Staff of the Army and the high command of the Navy are both represented on this board, and it is assumed they cooperate in such matters.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. PITTENGER. Is it not the proper procedure for that board to present evidence before the Naval Affairs Committee and the Military Affairs Committee and ask for these additional defenses?

Mr. HINSHAW. Not unless they are called upon or directed to do so, as I understand it.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not use any more of my time except to say again that I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will consider this matter favorably and perhaps enlarge the scope of this inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an opinion of the Supreme Court rendered March 25, 1940, on the Puerto Rican land situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD]?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, April 1, 1940, at 12 o'clock noon.

Teach us to put away all bitterness and misunderstanding, that we, with all the brethren of the Son of Man, may draw together as one comity of peoples and dwell evermore in the fellowship of that Prince of Peace who liveth and reigneth with Thee in the unity of the Holy Spirit both now and for evermore. Amen.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND AT MARMET, W. VA.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 173)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate:

I am returning herewith, without my approval, S. 1750, an act authorizing the Secretary of War to convey to the town of Marmet, W. Va., two tracts of land to be used for municipal purposes.

It is the purpose of this bill to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to convey by quitclaim deed to the town of Marmet, W. Va., two tracts of land aggregating approximately 4.38 acres, more or less, situated on the west side of the Great Kanawha River, at lock and dam No. 2, in Marmet, W. Va., no longer needed for the purpose for which acquired, and being a part of the 9.24 acres acquired by the Government in 1933 at a cost of $25,000 for access purposes and as a site for the storage of equipment and materials during the construction of the dam. The town of Marmet desires the land for use as a play and recreational ground for the town, as well as the immediate environment at the Great Kanawha Valley.

The act of August 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 800), authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of building sites under his control for which he had determined there was no further Federal need by sale and quitclaim deed to States, counties, municipalities, and other political subdivisions, at a price not less than 50 percent of the value of the land as appraised by the Treasury Department; and the act of August 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 885), authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to sell any real property of the United States outside the District of Columbia and exclusive of military or naval reservations, surplus to the needs of the Federal Government, at public sale to the highest responsible bidder.

It would appear, therefore, that regardless of the procedure that may have been followed prior to the enactment in 1935 of these two laws, their enactment definitely establishes the intent of the Congress and the policy of the Federal Government, to the effect that it is not in the public interest to grant public land without compensation, although differentiating in favor of States, counties, and municipalities as to the amount of compensation that should be paid.

I feel compelled, therefore, to withhold my approval of the bill, but I would not object to the enactment of legislation which would permit the Secretary of War to deed this property to the town of Marmet at a price not less than 50 percent of the current appraised value thereof.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 1, 1940.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the message of the President, with the accompanying bill, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE—RESOLUTION OF THE MISSISSIPPI LEGISLATURE

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I present for printing in the RECORD under the rule and reference to the Committee on Finance a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, memorializing the Congress to enact the Connally bill, providing for additional old-age assistance. As the Senate will recall, during the last session, along with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and a number of our colleagues, I made every effort to have enacted the amendment offered at that time by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to the social-security legislation, providing for increased old-age assistance to needy aged persons.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be received, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed in the RECORD.

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi (the senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully petitioned to pass this measure.

POLISH COMMUNITY HOME,
Binghamton, N. Y., March 17, 1940.

Hon. JAMES M. MEAD,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: For your consideration and official action we hereby respectfully submit to you, as directed by the mass meeting which unanimously adopted them, the following resolutions, with our respectful plea to personally help in carrying them out in letter and spirit and to have them spread upon the official CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for perusal, consideration, and action of Congress.

Resolved, That we, assembled here this Sunday evening, March 17, 1940, constituting the entire Polish population of Binghamton, N. Y., Johnson City, N. Y., Endicott, N. Y., and its environs, as American citizens, in accordance with American ideals and traditions, hereby petition our President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin Delano Roosevelt; the Congress of the United States; Hon. John Nance Garner, the Vice President, as President of the United States Senate; Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, as Speaker of the House of Representatives; Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER, United States Senator; Hon. JAMES MEAD, United State Senator; and the Honorable EDWIN ARTHUR HALL, Congressman from the Thirty-fourth District of New York, to support and to have Congress make the necessary appropriations for Polish relief and to take steps officially to answer the cry of distress and pleas for help of millions of suffering people of Poland, now temporarily in the toils and grips of the German Nazi and Russian Soviet invaders.

Resolved, That the aid and relief from our American Government, as well as all other aid and relief of the different and various humanitarian agencies of America, be distributed by Americans, and that it be carried on under American supervision in accordance with precedents and justice.

Resolved, That we hereby further petition our Government to see to it that all aid and relief from America for the suffering, needy, and starving people of Poland is carried on, distributed, and supervised by Americans for the benefit of people of Poland and not for the benefit of their enemies and invaders.

Resolved, That we hereby solemnly pledge our continued aid and support to the cause of giving aid and relief to the suffering, needy, and distressed people of Poland until they are free and independent and are with other free and civilized people of the world permitted to carry on their mission for the benefit of freedom, humanity, civilization, and peace.

Resolved, That we further petition our Government to intervene for the cause of all humanity to prevent the hideous and barbarous treatment of all the peoples of Poland, and to protest most vigorously the unnecessary slaughter of a defenseless people; namely, the aged, women, and children.

The demonstration which the foregoing resolutions were presented and adopted was under the auspices of the Polish Community Club, which represents and combines the large organizations of Americans of Polish ancestry, their churches, and their institutions in the work of raising funds for helping the cause of Polish relief.

Respectfully submitted for your kind consideration and action by direction of the mass meeting and by the order of the Polish Community Club, for them and in their name.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present a letter in the nature of a petition from the Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor asking for the defeat of the pending House Joint Resolution 407 unless it includes complete protection based on the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. I ask that the entire letter be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT AND WAYNE COUNTY FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Detroit, Mich., March 29, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Upon instructions of the Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor, we desire to place before you a request that you vote against the continued authorization in reciprocal-trade treaties the admittance of any foreign-made products competitive with products made by American workers unless the total cost of these articles, including duties paid, are equal to the cost of American products or wholesale selling prices in the competitive American market.

Our delegates feel that to permit foreign-made products to enter this market in competition with American-made products on a price that is below that of American manufacturers' cost of production will only result in exporting the American workingman's job to a foreign country.

God knows we have plenty of unemployed in this country already without giving our jobs to workers in other countries where wage standards are below American wages.

Very respectfully,

DETROIT AND WAYNE COUNTY FEDERATION OF LABOR,
FRANK X. MARTEL, President.

R. 8745) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed as follows:

On page 110, between lines 13 and 14, insert the following new paragraph:

"Dinosaur National Monument, Utah: For reliefing the dinosaur skeletons on the quarry wall, for protection of such skeletons from the elements, for personal services, general expenses, supplies, traveling expenses, and mechanical equipment in connection with such project, including not exceeding $1,400 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of a heavy-duty truck, $40,080."

TELEVISION INVESTIGATION

Mr. LUNDEEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 251), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Whereas the Federal Communications Commission on February 29, 1940, issued an order permitting limited commercial sponsorship of television beginning September 1, 1940; and

Whereas television interests immediately launched a manufacturing, advertising, and sales promotion campaign; and

Whereas the Federal Communications Commission on March 22, 1940, rescinded its order of February 29, 1940, with resultant confusion in the minds of the public and causing abandonment of manufacturing, advertising, and sales programs which had, in effect, been authorized by the Commission's earlier ruling: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce is hereby requested to investigate the actions of the Federal Communications Commission in connection with the development of television and, in particular, to ascertain whether the Commission has exceeded its authority, and whether it has interfered with the freedom of public and private enterprise.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR WEATHER BUREAU

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess last Friday the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] had offered an amendment to the pending joint resolution and expressed the hope that he might address the Senate upon it today. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, permit me not to allow the record of our action on the 1941 agricultural bill to be closed without voicing regret of the inadequate treatment we have accorded the Weather Bureau.

Respect for the gentlemen who serve faithfully on the Appropriations Committee constrains me to make this statement, not in protest but as a constructively intended suggestion.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] and his distinguished associates have faced a peculiarly difficult task. Their conclusions were reached sincerely. I am grateful for the $116,000 which their action has added to the Weather Bureau's prospective funds. I can even understand that it took courage and persistence on the part of clear-thinking Senators to make that addition; but it falls short of the $400,000 increase approved and recommended by the Budget Bureau, for one of the most important services in our civil establishments.

I am proud of the United States Weather Bureau. I am proud of its 70 years of service to the American people. I am proud of its high score in economy. I am proud of its increasingly high score in accuracy of prediction. I am proud of its open-minded ability to adopt new methods and to set new goals in the form of constantly higher standards of accomplishment.

I am proud of American aviation. To aviation I give the credit for confronting the Weather Bureau with a challenge for more detailed observing and casting. A pilot about to fly an airplane from Cleveland to Chicago could not get along with merely a prediction of the weather at Cleveland, or even with a knowledge of the weather conditions within a 50- or 60-mile radius of Cleveland. He had to know what the weather would be 3 hours thereafter in Chicago; otherwise he would not know whether he could land safely. And he had to know what weather to expect at every intermediate point in order to know whether he could take his flight through. Moreover, his information had to be current and accurate; he was staking his life on it.

Observations taken at widely scattered sampling spots once or twice or four times a day would not do. Aviation required a sure knowledge of weather changes; and that called for hourly observations at points less than 100 miles apart. Furthermore, the airplane pilot could not proceed solely on a knowledge of surface weather. He also had to know the strength and direction of winds aloft; the temperature, pressure, the humidity of the upper air at various altitudes; where ice was forming, and where he could avoid it.

So different were the weather requirements of aviation from any requirements that had preceded them, that, after we passed the Air Commerce Act of 1936, and in that act charged the Weather Bureau with the duty of furnishing meteorological service for the civil airways, the Weather Bureau developed, in addition to its general weather service—a distinct new aerological or airway weather service to meet the needs of aviation.

Then came the revelation that the accurate and timely observations and forecasts made for the airways were worth their weight in gold to the general weather service. Seized upon and used for the benefit of everybody, they raised the general weather service to a new standard of helpfulness.

Likewise, with the upper-air soundings. Weather observations of this character were begun in 1898 with the use of kites and captive balloons, as a part of the general weather service. Upper-air wind measurements, begun 20 years later, likewise were first undertaken as a part of the general weather service. Such intensive and successful development did these activities receive at the hands of the Weather Bureau's airway establishment that today whenever we hear them mentioned I believe we think of them as special services for the benefit of aviation. Quite on the contrary, the development they have undergone to meet the exacting requirements of aviation have made them vastly more useful to everybody. The knowledge gained from even the limited number of upper-air observations now made has formed the basis for learning the behavior of the great air masses which generate the weather. And this increased knowledge, in turn, is making it possible to make surprisingly accurate long-range predictions. Thanks to this general progress arising from the developments required by aviation, it will be possible within the next few years—assuming that we do not withhold the necessary appropriations—to have the weather accurately predicated many days in advance.

The wise administration of the Weather Bureau last year began to combine the "general" and "airway" weather services. At Kansas City and at Albuquerque, all of the general forecasting for a great bank of the Southwestern States is now done at the airway forecast centers. And so successful have been the results that in the 1941 fiscal program, which we have just enacted, the two formerly separate services have been combined throughout for the entire country.

But when that fiscal program came to this Congress, I regret to say that we made this wise unification of the weather service a basis for cutting down the Budget recommendation for its support. The Budget Bureau recommended an increase of $400,000 for 1941, over the sum of the two previously separate appropriations for the fiscal year 1940. The money was for specific and badly needed new items of work, all set out in explicit detail and with excellent justification.

Management of the Weather Bureau's work as one unit is, of course, going to lead to better husbandry of money. But I think it surpasses human expectation to believe that even the Weather Bureau can effect $300,000 worth of economy in the first year of the unification.

Let me cite one illustration: In the coming fiscal year the Weather Bureau should spend an additional $250,000 in securing weather reports from ships on the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans. We require a certain amount of service of that nature, but if we do not appropriate the money to pay for it we do not get it. No amount of administrative wisdom or unified management can reduce this type of cost.

Similarly, a large part of the Weather Bureau's yearly expenditures is for telegraph tolls. The size of the bill depends on the number of messages. As new observing stations are required, and as more observations per day become necessary, this bill is bound to go up. Either we appropriate the money or the Weather Bureau cannot buy the service.

Eventually, I am sure, savings will be effected which may even exceed the $300,000 presumed in the report from the House Appropriations Committee which I have been quoting; but no such savings will be achieved in the first year, or the first 2 years, of articulating such a huge mechanism, especially when the service faces urgent and growing necessity of expansion.

I saw the estimate of improvements in the Weather Bureau's facilities that remained unprovided for after we had enacted the 1940 appropriation bill. The total was a little over $1,800,000. That list had its origin in the work of the special committee presided over by my illustrious predecessor, the distinguished Senator Royal S. Copeland. I know that each segment which had been removed from the list and appropriated for in the past three agricultural bills had been subjected to the closest scrutiny, not only by the Weather Bureau, but successively by the Secretary of Agriculture and his fiscal officers, the Budget Bureau, Mr. CANNON's committee in the House, and our own Appropriations Committee, of which Senator Copeland was a member; and that the items which were provided for in those appropriations fully stood up under that scrutiny. I know that on at least two occasions since the 1940 Appropriation Act was passed, the Weather Bureau has subjected that $1,800,000 residue to a battering analysis, in which the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the military and civil users of the airways have participated, in order to knock out of the list every possible unnecessary or unjustifiable item. Yet that list stands today at $2,003,600. Every possible reduction in it has been offset, and the total even a little outbalanced, by the current and reasonable increase that goes hand in hand with the normal growth of an essential service.

That means that today we ought to be spending $2,000,000 more on the Weather Bureau than we are spending. I have not deducted the $216,000 by which the appropriation stands increased in the 1941 agricultural bill as we have returned it to the House. I mentioned a few moments ago that the Weather Bureau's telegraph charges amount to $400,000 a year. On January 1, after the 1941 Budget estimates had been completed, the Federal Communications Commission increased by 50 percent the rates which the Government pays for telegraph messages. You can figure the result for yourselves. The $216,000 which we have added to the Weather Bureau's funds is going to amount to about $16,000 net. The result is that for another 15 months we are leaving the Weather Bureau service exactly where it is, except for such economies as the unified management of activities may engender.

This means something to all of us. I am not now talking about the remaining gaps along the airways. I am not talking about the regrettable delay in realizing the benefits of long-range air-mass forecasts. I am not talking about the handicap we are putting ourselves under, in flying the Pacific, in flying the Atlantic, and in pioneering the great frontier of the South Pacific to New Zealand, all without making provision for weather reports from the oceans. I am talking in homely terms which I think every Senator will understand.

I mean that in my home city of Buffalo, the Weather Bureau station will continue for 15 months to make one daily observation of the upper-air weather instead of the two per day that it ought to make. I mean that the weather observatory on Whiteface Mountain, that ought to be functioning today, will not be established until 1942 or 1943. I mean that the new off-airway station that ought to be established at Watertown will not be established, and that the stations at Canton and Delhi and Knapp Creek and Lake Placid, which ought to make observations and send in reports every 3 hours, will still be operating on a 6-hour schedule no matter how rapidly the weather changes.

My distinguished colleagues from Arizona will find that their State will have to get along for another 15 months without a Weather Bureau airport staff at at least two places where such a staff should be functioning today; without two new off-airway stations that ought to be operating this month and this minute; without a mountain observatory which ought to be established within the next 6 months; and with at least three of their existing Weather Bureau stations continuing to function at half efficiency.

I could go down the list of States and be equally specific.

The $216,000 that we added to the 1941 Weather Bureau appropriation has a history. I have shown how it resulted from paring down unjustifiably a Budget recommendation of $400,000. The $400,000 Budget recommendation itself was the product of paring. The Chief of the Weather Bureau testified in the Senate hearings that the amount which the Department had asked the Budget Bureau to recommend was at least twice that much. If the Department's request was $800,000, that was still only 40 percent of the currently existing needs. And I have shown that the increase we have voted, in which I hope the House will concur, has been all but swallowed up by the increase in the Weather Bureau's telegraph bill.

This is no way to catch up with current needs. I ask that we start now to put ourselves in a frame of mind so that when the next Weather Bureau budget recommendations come before us we will stop being ostriches. The only way to buy $2,000,000 worth of needed service is to appropriate $2,000,000.

GRASSHOPPER AND MORMON CRICKET CONTROL CAMPAIGNS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Nevada that I am asking him to yield for the purpose of having read a letter pertaining to an item in the deficiency appropriation bill which is now in conference. I think I ought to tell the Senator that I am going to ask that it be read. However, it is not a long letter.

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I send to the desk a letter which I ask to have read and referred to the Senate conferees on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read and referred as requested by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I call the attention of the conferees to the letter. I think it has a direct bearing on the appropriation bill they have in charge.

The legislative clerk read as folows:

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION WORK IN AGRICULTURE AND HOME ECONOMICS, STATE OF NEBRASKA,
March 26, 1940.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: Information has reached the Nebraska Grasshopper Control Committee that a shortage of funds is causing serious delay in Federal activities necessary for the most effective conduct of the grasshopper and Mormon cricket control campaigns for the coming season. Materials that should be ordered immediately are not being purchased, repairs to trucks and other machinery needed in the work are being delayed, and the necessary arrangements for field offices and supervisors are not being made. All of these are fundamental to the success of the actual control program.

Organization of the work must not be interrupted now if crop losses are to be prevented. It is therefore important that the proposed appropriation for the control of grasshoppers and Mormon crickets be made available at the earliest possible moment. The success of this program is vital to Nebraska interests and any further help that you can give will be appreciated.

Yours respectfully,

W. H. BROKAW,
Chairman, Director Extension Service,
LOUIS BUCHHOLZ,
Director of Agriculture.
W. W. BURR,
Director of Experimental Station.
MYRON H. SWENK,
Chairman, Department of Entomology.
FRANK B. O'CONNELL,
Secretary, Nebraska Game, Forestation, and Parks Commission.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Just a word in line with the letter which has been read.

The deficiency appropriation bill as it came to the Senate carried $2,000,000 for the grasshopper and Mormon cricket control program, and the Senate added a further million dollars. The conference report was rejected, and the matter has now gone to the House. The House, of course, is its own master, and we have been waiting for the House either to authorize its conferees to have a further conference or to take some other action in regard to the bill. The Senate asked a further conference and appointed conferees in order to take up this one item in dispute; so we are now awaiting the action of the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may say further that there is now in this fund, left over from last year, the sum of $400,000, which may be used for any necessary immediate purpose in eradicating or controlling the pests. The Senator from Colorado has correctly stated the facts.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may say a word in reply to the two Senators, who are members of the conference committee of the Senate, I have had this letter read, coming from the authorized officials of the various Nebraska organizations having to do with the grasshopper and Mormon cricket plague, for the purpose of giving information to the conferees, and have had it referred to the conferees, so that when the proper time comes, if the House does not recede prior to any conference, the Senate conferees may have this information, which I think is very valuable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter presented by the Senator from Nebraska will be referred to the Senate conferees on the first deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 8641).

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, before referring to the amendment which I offered at the last session of the Senate and had read, I desire to touch upon the correspondence which was inserted in the RECORD by the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a few moments ago. I address both able Senators—one from Colorado and the other from Nebraska—on the subject of the letter. The Senator from Colorado being the chairman of the Senate conferees, I naturally ask for his attention for the reason that, in keeping with the letter placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Nebraska, a number of telegrams and letters have come to me from my own State, which is now being infested with the first hatch of Mormon crickets.

If there is anything in the world that is destructive of vegetable life in general, much more destructive than even the grasshopper infestation, it is the Mormon cricket. Not only that, but those having control of the transcontinental highways are instructed to post the highways to advise those who travel to be careful because of the danger from Mormon crickets. Many accidents have occurred, some of them resulting in the loss of human life, by reason of the infestation of Mormon crickets covering the highways and so smearing the roads that automobiles skid and go off the grades. That is one thing, but vegetation in general is now being threatened and destroyed by the annual infestation of Mormon crickets which is now manifesting itself. If we can have action taken now, while the Mormon cricket is in his adolescent stage, we can at least put an end to the greatest part of the destruction. I join the Senator from Nebraska in the suggestion to the Senator from Colorado, and others on the conference committee.

Mr. President, to address myself now to the amendment which I had read last Friday, and which has to do with exempting commodities upon which excise taxes have been approved by Congress in years past from the effect of the reciprocal-trade law, there are four commodities which Congress saw fit to protect by way of what we term excise taxes. The able chairman of the Committee on Finance may take issue with the term "excise taxes." The reason why I take that position is because the RECORD shows that, in 1934, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], intimated that, in his judgment, these taxes were not excise taxes, but were duties.

In the same speech, Mr. President, the able Senator from Mississippi made it known, not only in one presentation upon the floor of the Senate, but in two, as I recall, that the excise taxes on copper, coal, lumber, and oil were regarded by him, and were to be regarded by those who had the administration of the reciprocal-trade law, as frozen; in other words, they were not to be affected by any action of the President under the reciprocal-trade law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I will yield in a moment. The able Senator from Mississippi made that exceedingly plain by using the term "frozen," and I draw it to his attention. In other words, the taxes were not to be at all affected by the measure which we were considering in 1934, and which we again considered in 1937, and which is again before the Senate.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the trend of the Senator's argument, because I intend to discuss this matter in my own time, but, since the statement of the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the committee, has been mentioned, I do wish to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that, while the chairman of the committee stated that, in his opinion, the excise taxes should be "frozen", the chairman of the committee later offered an amendment to incorporate in the bill itself a provision for freezing those excise taxes, and that on the very bitter protest of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], one of the champions of the excise tax on copper, the Senator from Mississippi then withdrew the amendment; it was then reoffered by the then Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long, and defeated by the Senate on a yea and nay vote, the vote being 29 to 57, and among those voting "nay" on that question were the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. It seems to me that sufficiently disposes of what was held out in the discussion of the subject during the consideration of the act of 1934.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri correctly cites the RECORD; but it will be recalled that prior to the time the Senator from Arizona protested the amendment which was to be offered by the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Mississippi had made the statement, had made it clear, had made it emphatic, that all excise taxes were regarded as frozen. He used the word "frozen." When that statement was made on the floor of this legislative body by the chairman of the committee having to do with that particular subject, wherein he said in emphatic terms that excise taxes on particular commodities which the body had under consideration then should be frozen, those of us who come from the States producing these commodities regarded it as a solemn declaration, a solemn statement of purpose, an indication of what the purpose of the legislation was; and we thought that that purpose, so declared, and that statement, so announced by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, would be carried out in entirety.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I may say to the Senator that substantially the same statement was made in the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives when it presented the proposed legislation in the first place. So the Senator has not only the assurance of the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, he has the assurance of the text of the House Ways and Means Committee report.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am sure the Senator is entirely correct, from my reading of what occurred.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a further interruption, it seems to me that the action of the Senate itself, by an overwhelming majority of two to one rejecting such an amendment to freeze the tax, is of the highest importance and of the most compelling force.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I prefer not to yield just now. I prefer to answer the Senator. Then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, there is an answer.

Mr. McCARRAN. The vote on the amendment offered by the late lamented and much beloved Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long, followed the announcement of the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I voted against the Long amendment, because I relied on the word of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and I thought there was no necessity for doing more.

Mr. President, I state, without fear of contradiction, believing that I am as correct as to others as I am as to myself, that other Senators voted against the Long amendment, because the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who had the subject in hand, had promised us, had said here on the floor on at least two occasions, that it was not the intent at all to interfere with those things which were covered by excise taxes.

I represented a State which produced only one of the commodities; that is, copper. There were here on the floor of the Senate those who represented States which produced others of the commodities, namely, lumber, coal, and oil. I voted on the Long amendment, and I am one of those, as I recall, voting against the Long amendment, because of the history of the whole transaction, the history of the whole proposition from beginning to end.

Now, if the Senator from Michigan wishes to have me yield, I am glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it is interesting to note another collateral fact of the time. I think that when the able Senator from Mississippi offered his amendment, intending in good faith to carry out his promise to us that these excise taxes should not be reduced, his reason for withdrawing the amendment was that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] made a fervid plea that nothing should be done to prevent an increase in the protection which copper should receive. His protest was against something which would prevent an increase. Of course, that is a totally different contemplation. Some of us did not understand his position at the time, and I think perhaps he may have misapprehended the purpose of the amendment, but he clearly made it obvious that he was taking his position against any stricture which would prevent an increased protection for copper.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Since the Senator from Michigan has put this construction on the matter, I should merely like to call attention to the fact that the issue was drawn with the greatest possible clearness by the late Senator from Louisiana, and no man who has served in this body during my membership in the Senate could draw an amendment with greater clearness than he could when he desired to do so. I read from the RECORD of June 4, 1934, page 10392. The Senator from Mississippi interrupted the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that I withdrew the amendment.

Mr. LONG. I am not censuring the Senator from Mississippi. I am offering his amendment, which I presume he will support. I believe he will.

Mr. President, we were told that these commodities would be protected because the tariffs we have on oil and lumber and coal and copper are very necessary. A number of Senators and I fought here many nights and many days to get tariffs on these items, and we want to protect them.

Senators will notice that he said "tariffs," not "excises."

We were assured that they would be protected. Today, as an example, notwithstanding the fact that it is said we have an overproduction of oil in America, nonetheless we are importing into the country 260,000 barrels of oil a day. Notwithstanding all our lumber trouble and the cheapness of lumber, lumber is still being imported. We were told, and we believed, and I am sure Senators mean to stick by it, that we should have this tariff protection, and it would be disastrous to us if it were not given to us.

I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The Senator from Louisiana drew that issue with the greatest possible clearness and explicitness.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, Mr. President; but if the Senator will now read the observations of the Senator from Arizona, he will find that they entirely justify the observation I made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I read the observations of the Senator from Arizona this morning, and before that on yesterday, and, further, I heard them when they were delivered.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I think we have all gone through the history of when this record was made. There is no doubt in my mind as to what was the intendment of the Senator from Mississippi when, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, he made the statement before the Senate to which I have referred. He will not deny that he made the statement. He sought at that time to establish a fact; he sought at that time to do what many of us do in debate here, to have it understood as the sense of this body what was intended by the proposed legislation then pending. If the Senator from Mississippi had intended anything else, of course he would now contradict me. He was clear; he was frank; he was honest about it. He wanted those of us who were interested in excise taxes to know he wanted those representing the copper-producing States, for instance, to know that the 4 cents imposed as an excise tax or duty on copper would not be disturbed, because he knew, as we know, as the able Senator from Arizona, representing one of the great copper-producing States of the Union, knows, that if the 4-cent excise tax or protection is taken off copper, the copper mines of Arizona will be closed. I know that if the 4-cent tax on copper is taken off, the copper mines of Nevada will be closed, and I know that if the copper mines of Nevada are closed, five or six or seven thousand miners, together with their dependents, will be put on the relief rolls.

Mr. President, the able Senator from Montana knows that when the 4-cent excise tax is taken off copper the mines of Butte will be closed and Butte copper miners will be put on the relief rolls. Some of us would battle until the end to obtain a clear knowledge of the effect of the reciprocal-trade agreements on the 4-cent tax protection to copper.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. I can verify the statement just made by the able Senator from Nevada with respect to the effect of the withdrawal of the excise tax, or a material modification of it, on copper production and employment in Montana. During the year 1929, when the country was enjoying the highest degree of prosperity, the mines in Butte, Mont., were already closing down because foreign-produced copper could be delivered in New York for less than the cost of production in Montana. These conditions rapidly increased in the years following. The mines operated by the Anaconda Copper Co. in Chile were shipping cheaply produced copper into this country free of duty and delivering it here at a price cheaper than the figure at which it could be produced in Montana and other copper-producing States. So it seems to me, Mr. President, that if anything should now be done affecting the operation of these excise taxes it would have a disastrous effect on the American copper producer.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am grateful to the junior Senator from Montana for the contribution he has made, because no one in this body understands the copper situation better than he does. From the standpoint of the welfare of the toiler, no State in the Union is more greatly affected or will be more greatly affected than the State of Montana. The State of Utah, the State of Nevada, the State of Arizona, all the copper-producing States, are interested in knowing that the industry is protected perpetually, so that copper produced by slave labor and under slave conditions shall not be brought into this country to close American mines and thus throw our miners out of employment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator might add that under the latest copper development in South Africa, where the copper is virtually scooped off the ground, it can be delivered in New York for almost the amount of the 4-cent excise protection which we are seeking to maintain.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am grateful to the Senator from Michigan for his contribution. The Senator from Michigan represents a State, and represents it ably, which is equally interested in the subject of copper.

Let me deal with this subject from a factual standpoint. Today Northern Rhodesia can export copper to this country so cheaply that no American copper mine, in competition with it, can possibly operate and pay even working expenses. The average wage per day in Rhodesia is in the neighborhood of 30 cents. The average wage per day in Chile is less than 60 cents. The average wage of the American miner in the copper industry is based upon a scale which depends on the market price of copper. Today our copper miners, working in the copper mines of Montana, Nevada, Arizona, and other copper producing States, are earning from $4.50 to $6.50 a day.

When the 50-cent copper produced under slave and peon labor in Chile is imported into this country, in competition with the copper produced under the American standards of living, the result is simply to close down the copper mines of the United States. When oil produced in South America, under present conditions there, is imported into the United States and competes with the oil-producing States of this country, the result is to destroy or impair our oil-producing industry.

Why am I interested in this subject? Because in my State and the other States producing copper, miners are employed. They are not industrial States from the standpoint of processing. They employ miners to produce the raw commodity from the mines. The continued operation of their mines allows the miners and their dependents to enjoy American life by their own industry and by their own efforts. If the price of these commodities is reduced, and our miners are placed in competition with slave labor abroad, then confidence in American institutions is destroyed.

As I have said, I represent a State which produces only one of the commodities under consideration. The Senators from Michigan represent a State interested not only in copper, but in lumber as well. The State of Arizona is interested in the production of copper. Other States, such as Pennsylvania and Oklahoma are interested in oil production. In every one of these instances those who are engaged in the production of these commodities are looking to the continuation of the excise tax, so that the industry thus protected may be permitted to continue, so that the toilers in those States may know that it is not a question which rests in the hands or on the judgment of some particular appointed individual, who has no responsibility to the people of the United States, but who will decide in Washington, in a star-chamber proceeding, whether or not the industry on which the toiler depends shall go forward or shall be closed down and go out of existence.

Mr. President, that is why some of us are protesting to the end that this reciprocal-trade law shall not touch upon or impinge upon those commodities with respect to which the Congress of the United States, based upon investigation and understanding, has placed an excise tax.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I recall that in October of last year in this Chamber the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] discussed the history of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, and the effect of the trade agreements upon the excise tax. I recall very vividly when these excise taxes were included in the tariff law. At that time I was very much interested, and I am now interested in the excise tax on lumber. I suggested at the time of the speech by the Senator from Michigan that we knew or at least felt encouraged that if the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed the excise tax would not be molested. I was given on this floor full assurance by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that the excise duty upon the four products which the Senator has mentioned would not be touched. I was given the same assurance that they would not be touched, by the able Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. This assurance was given after a discussion had with several other Senators with respect to the difference between tariff rates and excise duties.

We relied upon these repeated assurances, and I say to the able Senator that in the northwestern section of the country a great injury was done to the timber and forest-products industry when the $1 excise tax was removed from lumber products. I do not want to see a recurrence of such a thing in connection with the other commodities with respect to which we have now imposed the excise tax. I think the copper industry and the other industries which are still in that category of protection should still continue there, without any notion on the part of the Secretary of State that the tax should be removed, but in view of the precedent with respect to lumber, unquestionably if the Secretary or his advisers believed that they could get a better trade agreement on copper from a copper-producing country, that excise duty on copper would be removed.

We judge of the future by what has occurred in the past, and in spite of the efforts which were made by myself and others to persuade the Secretary of State to honor the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the dollar excise tax was taken off. And what is true of lumber will be true of copper if the opportunity arises which might justify such action on the part of the Secretary of State or his advisers.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from Oregon for his observation, because it is a true statement of what has occurred and is not denied by the able Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. President, what has followed since the making of the legislative history to which we have referred? Following the action under the reciprocal-trade law which affected lumber, last September, as will be recalled, there was proposed a reciprocal-trade agreement between this country and Chile, by which copper was to be affected. Immediately the able Senators from Arizona, leading the vanguard of those of us who are opposed to a change in copper excise taxes, went before the representatives of the State Department and protested any change in the excise tax on copper. There was a debate on the floor of the Senate, I recall, between the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Mississippi, in which the language of the Senator from Mississippi was brought back again to the floor of the Senate, language by which we had been assured that these excise taxes were "frozen," to use the expression of the Senator from Mississippi. Notwithstanding that, those in charge of the reciprocal trade agreement machinery in the State Department were seriously considering reducing the tariff on copper. All of a sudden, after the protest became sufficiently violent and it was sufficiently apparent that the representatives of the copper-producing States were not going to support the continuation of the Reciprocal Trade Act, there was an announcement to the effect that copper had been dropped from the program and would not be affected.

If, notwithstanding the assurance given by the chairman of the Committee on Finance to the United States Senate, and the promise given to Senators, which caused the Senators from Arizona to vote against the Long amendment, those having control of the administration of the reciprocal-trade law had the temerity to include copper as a commodity upon which there was to be a proposed reduction—if notwithstanding all that those having control of the administration of the reciprocal-trade law had the temerity to dare to say that they would affect the excise taxes on copper, then there is no telling to what lengths they might go, notwithstanding any promise which might be made.

I say without fear of contradiction that the bill could not have been passed in 1934 if it had not been for the promise to which I refer and the understanding between the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the Senate. I believe the measure renewing the reciprocal-trade law could not have been passed in 1937 if it had not been for that understanding. Nevertheless, those having control of the administration of the reciprocal-trade law say that that understanding does not bind them. They propose to affect, and have already affected, two of the commodities and will affect more.

The Congress of the United States did not intend to pass a law which would permit those who have no responsibility to the people to affect a tax which was intended to be exempt from the effect of the law. Therefore, my amendment is offered so that the promise given by the chairman of the Finance Committee may be written into the law.

Mr. President, I think that what applies to four commodities should apply to every commodity on which an excise tax has been imposed; but inasmuch as only four commodities were mentioned by the chairman of the Committee on Finance in his promise to this body, my amendment touches only those four commodities. I hope the amendment may be adopted, so as to make it clear that when a Senator as able, experienced, and as much loved and honored in this body as is the chairman of the Committee on Finance, gives his promise to this body, that promise will be as good as law.

Mr. President, some Senators now in the Chamber have not heard the amendment stated. I ask unanimous consent that it be stated at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, after "1940", it is proposed to insert a comma and the following:

with the proviso that the authority conferred in the said act does not embrace authority to include in any trade-agreement negotiations excise taxes imposed under the provisions of paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (c) of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, which are now a part of the Internal Revenue Code, subtitle (c), chapter 29, subchapter (b), part 1, sections 3420, 3422, 3423, 3424, 3425.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, returning to the subject, I shall not detain the Senate much longer, except to draw to the attention of the Senate the history of this legislation, the fact that it was enacted in 1934, and the fact that at its enactment Senators who were interested in the subject matter of the four commodities affected, namely, copper, coal, lumber, and oil, had it made plain to them that the law would not affect those commodities. It was under those circumstances that the law was enacted in the first instance. At the risk of repetition, I say that it would not have been enacted if it had been known that the intention was to affect copper.

The remarks of the able Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] have been referred to. He may be considered the dean among Senators representing copper-producing States. At that time assurance was given to the Senator from Arizona. He did not want the proposed amendment to go in, because the assurance was even greater and more sacred than the amendment itself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Evidently the Senator has not lately read the objection of the Senator from Arizona, because I am certain that if the Senator had read it at any recent time he would not make the statement he has just made.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I read it as recently as this morning. The Senator from Arizona said that the amendment was born in iniquity, and so forth. He denounced it very bitterly. He denounced it because of the very answer that was given by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] a few moments ago, namely, that there would be a freezing with regard to the raising of the tax in protection of copper. It was his position that the 4-cent copper protection now afforded by the revenue law might be raised when, as, and if conditions in this country and abroad demanded the protection of an American industry in which hundreds of thousands of miners and their dependents are involved.

Mr. President, I leave the question with the Senate. It is not a matter to which I propose to devote much time, because the facts are so plain. The whole history of the legislation is clear. My good friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], notwithstanding the fact that he has been presented time and again with statements which he made, sees fit to corroborate what I say by his silence.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to submit an inquiry to the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] with regard to the history of the legislation, or at least call his attention to some of the history involved in the colloquy a few moments ago with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] regarding what took place on the floor of the Senate with regard to the discussion of these four commodities. I refer to page 1766 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday, October 31, 1939. On page 1084 the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] asked:

Is it not a fact that at the time the reciprocal trade treaty law was passed every effort was made on the floor of the Senate to make it clear and plain that the excise taxes on copper, coal, lumber, and oil were beyond the jurisdiction of the trade-treaty negotiators?

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] then interposed and stated:

That effort was very definitely made at the time the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act was under consideration. As a practical matter, it does not make sense to me to say that Congress would intentionally pass an act permitting tariff duties to be raised and lowered and have in mind anything other than an established tariff. If Congress does not act, the excise tax automatically expires, and then what have we? We have nothing to negotiate about. If, by the enactment of the reciprocal trade agreement law, the State Department had power to freeze the excise tax on copper at 2 cents without further action by Congress, I should say then there would be some logic to the proposed negotiations; but when the fact is that if nothing is done the tax automatically expires, it clearly indicates to me not only that Congress never contemplated that the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act should apply to excise taxes of this character, but in addition it would seem that any negotiations with Chile must rest on an unsound and insubstantial basis.

That statement certainly covers the attitude of the Senator from Arizona. It is supplemental to what has been stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I am not now testifying, but I made a statement along the same line. So I think it must be clear to anyone that when we considered the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, everyone relied on the assurances that these particular excise taxes would not be touched. I think that is the recollection of the Senator from Nevada. It is the recollection of the Senator from Michigan, of the Senator from Arizona, and of myself. We are all recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 1084 and subsequent pages.

Mr. President, I call attention to this matter only because of the statement made a few moments ago by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that no such implication could be gleaned from the statement of the Senator from Arizona.

I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Not only is the Senator entirely correct, but the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the inception of this question until the present time bears out the statement made by the Senator from Oregon. More than that, in June 1939, the Congress reenacted the excise tax of 4 cents on copper. That was long after we had enacted the reciprocal-trade law, showing what the intendment of Congress was as regards the freezing of the excise tax bearing on copper.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire briefly to state my reasons for opposing——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to state briefly my reasons for opposing the further extension of the policy of reciprocal-trade agreements. I should like, before doing so, to join sincerely in the general expressions of praise for the character and integrity of the Secretary of State. I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for many years, going back to the time when he was in the House of Representatives and I was in the press gallery. He was courteous and considerate to me then and has been so since. I can sincerely express the same regard for Senators who are on the opposite side of this question. Certainly the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has been an extremely fair chairman, and has always given those who were in the minority full opportunity to exercise their rights.

I am, first of all, impressed by the constitutional arguments in opposition to the pending joint resolution which have been so ably advanced in the week that has just passed. I cannot rid myself of the notion that this is an instance, to use the words Mr. Justice Cardozo employed in connection with a case pending before the Supreme Court, of "delegation run riot," and that if the Congress can abdicate so much of its power having to do with the raising of revenue and with the conclusion of treaties, it can equally well abdicate a great deal more of its power with respect to other equally essential functions of government. It is clear that if our government of checks and balances and our constitutional theory have any reality this is a case in which the power of the Executive should be curbed.

I am also impressed by the following arguments: First, that treaties require a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and that so-called trade agreements are treaties; second, the constitutional provision that "all legislative power shall be vested in a Congress"—the word "all" should be stressed in that connection—and, third, the constitutional provision that revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives.

I am informed that of the 22 nations with whom we have concluded trade agreements some 18 or 19 require that agreements made with them shall be ratified by the parliamentary body of the nation concerned.

It is clear also that this is a question in which partisanship really has no place. It has been demonstrated time and time again since this debate began that Republicans and Democrats have been on both sides of this question. I will not detain the Senate by quoting from the utterances of prominent statesmen on this subject. I should like, for the RECORD, however, as one exception, to cite the statement made by Secretary Hull when he was a Member of the House of Representatives with regard to a proposal which was much more limited than this and which he opposed in the following terms. I quote:

> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible-tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English king the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, "this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

I believe those words, which were so eloquently uttered in connection with a legislative proposal far less broad in its scope than this one, should give us pause today.

Mr. President, so much for the constitutional aspects. I am not going to detain the Senate long on the economic aspects of the case, except to reiterate the conviction I have expressed here before that to sell American goods to Americans is not only just as good as selling them to foreigners, but is better. The free-trade economic philosophy would have us believe that if an automobile made in Michigan, let us say, is sold in Europe, the transaction, by some mysterious alchemy, by some mystic induction, creates some new wealth which is not created if the automobile is sold to an American citizen. I have yet to see that proposition demonstrated. I have yet to see it proved. It seems to me that if an American automobile is sold to an American citizen, whether he lives in Massachusetts or whether he lives in Texas, or whatever State he may live in, it is better than selling the automobile abroad, because the American citizen who buys the automobile is going to be a customer for parts and for tires and for gasoline and for oil; he is going to eat at wayside lunchrooms, and in every way he is going to continue being a spender; and in order to maintain that car such expenditures will be made to American citizens instead of being made to foreigners.

I do not want to labor the economic argument, because it has been done much more ably than I can do it, and it is a two-sided proposition. But I contend that we are hypnotized by the idea that there is an advantage in selling our goods to foreigners over selling them to ourselves.

I should like to say, too, that I detest the old logrolling system just as much as do any of the advocates of the joint resolution. I should not want to go back to it. I was not in politics when the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act was passed. I note that it has not been repealed, although certainly the party in power has the votes in both branches of Congress to do so. I do not want to return to the logrolling method. The goal which appeals to me is the goal of William McKinley, who said, in 1897:

> The end in view is always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people, but tend rather to increase their employment.

There is a definite standard, an American standard, and a reasonable standard. I think those of us who oppose the pending measure—I know it is true in my case—favor a scientific tariff, arrived at in a scientific, decent, intellectually self-respecting way. We believe there ought to be some kind of a standard established, and that a question such as, Shall the United States be protectionist, or shall it be free trade? should not be left to the discretion of an administrative official. I should like to see a scientific tariff established with a protectionist philosophy, but, regardless of philosophy, I should like to see some kind of a standard written into this joint resolution.

This brings me to the point which impresses me the most, and which I do not think has been touched on as much in this debate as it should have been, and that is the contrast and the contradiction which the reciprocal-trade policy embodies.

Since I have been in Congress I have had the opportunity to support legislation aiming to increase the wages and reduce the hours and improve the working conditions of persons working in factories. As we look back over the years we find a constant improvement throughout American history in wages and in working conditions, going back to the early days in the textile mills when young girls were employed for long hours at a time for very small wages, and coming down to the conditions which today obtain in so many industries in which the hours are limited, and there is some kind of a minimum wage. I believe one of the most hopeful and one of the most inspiring things in our national history is the gradual improvement in the working conditions and the living conditions and the economic conditions of the average American citizen. It must be obvious to us all that goods manufactured under those conditions cost a great deal more than goods manufactured under sweatshop conditions, and that if we are going to try to build up the living conditions of our own people we simply cannot permit the entry of goods which are made by foreigners under definitely substandard conditions. There is a case in which we cannot ride two horses at once, because the two horses are going in opposite directions.

I understand that an amendment is to be offered to the pending joint resolution which will prevent the entry of goods produced under substandard labor conditions. I offered a similar amendment to the wage and hour bill when it was before the Senate. I certainly shall support the amendment in this instance. I think we have an absolutely hopeless contradiction here; that if we embrace the free-trade theory, the high-wage theory suffers, and if we embrace the high-wage philosophy, we are bound to restrict our foreign trade.

In this case there can be no doubt in the mind of anyone who studies the situation that the theory of raising wages and reducing hours is the one which is suffering and that the free-trade theory is in the ascendant in the conduct of our Government today. Of course, nobody is abandoning lip service to the ideal of high wages and shortened hours and better working conditions, but the fact remains that the extension of the free-trade principle is bound to be a hindrance to the extension of the high-wage principle.

Of course, the argument I have just made is criticized and attacked. Some say that it is the argument of isolationists. I have heard the word "isolationist" used a great deal on the floor of the Senate, and I have very seldom heard it defined. I do not know exactly what is meant by the appellation "isolationist." If the meaning is that an isolationist is a man who wants to protect his country from the bad influences of the outside world, then I say, yes; we are all isolationists. We ought to be. If an isolationist is a man who thinks it is easy for us to cut ourselves loose from the world, then, of course, no one but a fool would be an isolationist, because it is not easy. It seems to me it is desirable, however, for us to be as free as we possibly can from the dangerous influences which are at large in the world.

Of course, in the philosophy I am trying to describe there is no question of the United States moving to complete self-containment. That is a theoretical state of things which is just as impossible as a condition of complete free trade. The advocates of this joint resolution do not favor complete free trade any more than its opponents favor complete self-containment. There is a question of the direction in which we shall go, of the trend which we favor; and there is a legitimate question in my mind as to whether we, a vast continental nation with virtually limitless resources, should frame our trade policy as though we were a small island country which literally could not live without foreign trade.

There is a question of the trend which we follow, and what is that trend?

I respectfully submit that at present it is a trend toward increasing our trade relations with the armed camps of the world.

It is a trend which regards international trade as an end in itself, as something for which risks should be taken, for which men may even be called upon to die instead of merely viewing it for what it is, a useful economic tool.

It is a trend which assumes that nationalism is bad, which is a polite way of saying that patriotism is bad.

It is a trend which assumes that international trade promotes peace—an entirely unsupported and unsupportable assertion against which every counsel of experience and history stands in contradiction.

Indeed, wherever we turn we find that international trade is the cause of war rather than its preventer. It is certainly at the bottom of a great deal of the friction between Japan and China. It was certainly a factor in the rivalry between Germany and Great Britain in 1914, and it is certainly at the bottom of much of the trouble in Europe today. Certainly I think it is not at all extravagant to say that if international trade promotes peace and if the reciprocal trade-agreement policy promotes peace, the condition of Europe today is not a very convincing endorsement.

Prof. Charles A. Beard recently wrote an article, published in Harper's magazine, in which he listed some of the international wars which have taken place in the past century. Even though the list is quite long, I should like to read it into the RECORD. He lists the following:

1828–29, Russian war on Turkey.
1838–42, British war of Afghanistan.
1840, British opium war in China.
1845, British war in the Punjab.
1847, France finishes conquest of Algeria.
1854–56, England, France, Sardinia, and Turkey wage war on Russia.
1856–60, France and England wage war on China.
1859–60, France and Sardinia wage war on Austria.
1861, England, France, and Spain act against Mexico.
1864, Prussia attacks Denmark and seizes Schleswig-Holstein.
1866, German-Italian axis treaty; Germany wages war on Austria.
1870–71, Franco-Prussian War.
1877, Russia wages war on Turkey.
1881, France finished conquest of Tunis.
1882, Italy makes an axis with Austria and Germany; British seize Cairo.
1883, France finishes conquest of Annam.
1885, France takes Tonkin from China by war; Serbo-Bulgarian war.
1895, Japan finishes war on China.
1896, Italian war on Abyssinia.
1897, Germany seizes Kiao-chau in China.
1898, bloody uprising in Milan.
1899, Britain opens war on Boer republics.

Mr. President, that is the list of wars in the nineteenth century, and I think that any Senator who examines the list will have to admit in all candor that the desire for raw material, the desire for foreign markets, the desire to build up some kind of international commerce, played a very large part in every one of those wars, if not a decisive part, at least a very important and substantial part; and that whatever the economic advantages of the free-trade system may be, however secure its constitutional foundation may be, the contention that it promotes peace is unsupportable.

On the contrary, it seems to me that this policy would lead us to the conclusion that those who support it think that the good to be derived from foreign trade is so great as to justify a certain amount of risk. I tried to develop this point at the time the pending bill was being considered by the Committee on Finance, and I should like to read a brief extract describing a colloquy between the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and myself, which is found printed on page 152 of the hearings, as follows:

Senator LODGE. I said Great Britain, being an island and being dependent on foreign trade, naturally got involved in wars; that if you did not have the foreign trade you would get involved in wars just that much less.

Senator BARKLEY. You would just abolish foreign trade, then? You would just live on an island?

Senator LODGE. If you were single-minded about peace above everything else, that is what you would do.

Senator BARKLEY. If you were single-minded about peace and nothing else, all that you would have would be peace.

Senator LODGE. That is right. And it is better to be alive on a low living standard than to be rich and then get killed.

Senator BARKLEY. I would rather take a chance to keep alive by trade than to starve to death without it.

I congratulate the Senator from Kentucky on being so candid, so frank, because most people are not so candid and so frank. Most persons try to eat their cake and have it, too. They say, "Yes; we are going to have foreign trade, and ships all over the world, and navies to protect it, and we are going to have peace also." The Senator from Kentucky is very candid. He says, "I think foreign trade is such a good thing it is worth running some risk for."

That is a legitimate ground on which we can differ. That is his philosophy, and it is a very respectable one, but it is not a philosophy with which I agree. I think it points up this whole conflict, which to me seems very far reaching. It involves the philosophy of an America run for Americans, with the high-wage trend ever continuing. It involves the philosophy of having an internal situation which we can more or less control, and in which we can work out our own social reforms. It involves the question of having the United States keep out of foreign wars, walking a wide circle around them, and not getting into the frictions and involvements which are always caused by being dependent on foreign trade.

Mr. President, that is the real crux of this matter to me, and I humbly submit that it involves the whole American way of life, and involves the future of the American experiment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes; agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Mr. CANNON of Missouri, Mr. LUDLOW, Mr. SNYDER, Mr. O'NEAL, Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia, Mr. TABER, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, Mr. LAMBERTSON, and Mr. DITTER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, of late I have been receiving a good many communications which indicate to me that, while perhaps the Members of this body are familiar with the issues involved in the present debate, the citizen out on the farm, and in the village, and in the city, is very much confused. I have no idea of making any considerable contribution to the discussion of the issues here involved, but I do desire to state my position rather bluntly and plainly.

First. I believe everyone in this Chamber is in favor of fair, equitable trade agreements or treaties between this country and foreign nations.

Second. No one in this Chamber is against the principle of reciprocity embodied in such an agreement or treaty.

Third. A large group in this Chamber is in favor of the principle laid down in the Pittman amendment and the one which will be laid down later in the Adams amendment. Why? Because if the Supreme Court should hold that these agreements are not treaties, then we would have simply delegated the legislative power to the President to negotiate the agreements, and the Senate would pass upon them or renew them. Is there anything wrong about such a procedure?

If, on the other hand, the Supreme Court should hold that these agreements are treaties, then no harm would be done, because the President has the right to negotiate treaties and the Senate must then approve or disapprove them.

Fourth. If the Senate does not adopt the principle laid down in the Pittman amendment or a similar amendment, then a large group of Senators is not in favor of extending the legislative power to the President at this time. Why? Because of world conditions. If any reason not now apparent should become apparent in the future necessitating a change, of course Congress could be convened in extraordinary session, or Congress could at any regular session change its action.

Fifth. The best minds of America, I believe, should concentrate on American affairs instead of European affairs. The extensive trade we now have with Europe is not the result of these so-called reciprocal treaties, and when the war is over that trade will be gone. The best minds of America have a real job to attend to in this country. I refer to rehabilitating our farmers, getting jobs for youth, looking after the aged, extending and protecting the industrial life of the Nation, so that the unemployed and industry itself can get a break. All this must be done so that America will be equipped to meet the economic "blitzkrieg" which will inevitably follow the European war.

Mr. President, it is generally conceded that because of world conditions and because of America's virtual monopoly of gold the importance of reciprocal treaties, so-called, and their utility are constantly diminishing. Why? Because of foreign trade obstacles which virtually did not exist when Secretary Hull initiated the treaties. Straight tariffs do not count as they used to before the days of trade controls, export subsidies, barter agreements, exchange restrictions, exchange allotments, embargoes, currency blocs, and depreciated currencies.

The most-favored-nation policy, which we had much to do with, now operates in many instances to the detriment of our own industries and producers.

Mr. President, I believe that if the people of America were educated fully on these so-called trade barriers and informed further as to the effect of the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements on our economy, in that they are absolutely ineffectual to meet the new economic weapons forged by European governments because of economic conditions, the group now in favor of granting the additional power to the President would not be so insistent in their demands.

What I am getting at, bluntly, is that exchange quotas and controls, exchange restrictions imposed by foreign governments, discriminations by foreign governments, destruction of the structure of international prices, and depreciated currency, make the theory of reciprocal agreements unworkable. If that statement is correct, then all the argument that has been advanced is simply a smoke screen to hide the real purpose, which is to delegate to the Executive in these perilous times an additional power. My own thought is that the Congress has already delegated to him too much power. The powers conferred upon him by the Constitution are ample. Congress should exercise its own powers, and I believe that is the wish of the people, especially after 7 years of trial and error.

Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the dramatic appeal of the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], especially that part in which he claimed that if the pending measure should not become law there would be dire consequences to this Nation. Of course, what he said was simply an expression of opinion, and I value his opinion very highly, but I think in this particular he is very much mistaken.

What did he say the consequences would be?

He has assumed the following:

First. That the treaties would protect this Government in its dealings with foreign nations after the war was over.

Second. That the treaties would provide an instrument to put together the fragments and pieces of a torn and shattered civilization, or help to do so.

Third. If we should not pass the pending legislation we could not offer foreign nations adjustments of their tariff situation. He did not know what adjustments would be necessary.

Fourth. He asked the question: "Shall we be able to meet the situation with instrumentalities of government?"

Long before Secretary Hull started to operate his "reciprocity shop" America faced foreign situations. The President of the United States under the Constitution negotiated treaties and the Senate ratified them. Under the Constitution the President entered into agreements and compacts which were not treaties.

Mr. President, I do not like the tendency toward "Executive omniscience." It is bad business in Europe. It will be bad business here in the United States if put into effect. As I view the situation, we should not continue the authority in the President for the very reasons which became apparent from the argument of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

Answering the distinguished Senator on his first point, I ask, How will a treaty negotiated now, a reciprocal treaty that fixes the tariff basis on imports from any other country, operate to protect this Government after the war, especially if the present tariff is 50 percent of the much maligned Smoot-Hawley tariff? The distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts brought forth the idea, which I now emphasize. Is it not strange that the Smoot-Hawley tariff, so much vilified by our Democratic friends, has not been repealed by them? It will be remembered that for 7 long years the Democrats have had control of both Houses, and they have done nothing to repeal that law. In other words, they have recognized that in the days that are ahead this law will be a great barrier against America becoming inundated with foreign imports which might paralyze our internal economy.

The second point made by the Senator from Nebraska was that the reciprocal treaties would provide an instrument to put together shattered Europe. My answer is that it will take more than a reciprocal treaty; it will take the great charitable heart of America and the rest of the world; it will take another Hoover, the great humanitarian, to look after broken-down humanity. It will take men with vision in America, whose hearts are in America and who will not sell out America under an emotional jag of pity—practical men, men who know how to rebuild and construct—not theorists, but men who realize that the future of the world depends upon keeping America safe under her republican form of government. It will also take a Europe reborn to the need of getting rid of her centuries of hate and national animosities.

As for the third point, we are told by the distinguished Senator that if we do not confer this power on the President we cannot offer foreign nations adjustments of their tariff situation. I take it what he means is that Congress would not be willing to take down the barrier. If that is what the senior Senator from Nebraska means, I believe he is correct. We cannot help Europe after the war by paralyzing our own industries or by selling out our own domestic trade.

For his fourth point the distinguished Senator asked the question:

> Shall we be able to meet the situation with the instrumentalities of government?

This question implies that the power conferred upon the President to negotiate trade treaties would be a very significant instrument of government in the post-war years. I doubt the correctness of that conclusion. Let us get this question straight. The President, without this power, may negotiate treaties. We believe in having fair dealings with all nations that will deal with us fairly; but I believe the Senator, in his ardent advocacy of the measure, has blinded himself to the realities.

If we do not pass the joint resolution we shall not interfere with the right of the duly constituted authorities to negotiate commercial treaties, or with the right of the Executive, within his field, to enter into agreements or compacts. All we are doing is saying that for the time being we feel it unwise to extend this legislative power to the President.

A trade treaty implies that the two nations have something to trade. It must be conceded that any agreement with a war-racked nation, involving the importation of foreign goods in competition with American goods, should have not only the serious consideration of the experts in the State Department—who themselves are not immune to logrolling or influence—but in these critical times should be reviewed by the constitutional authority—the Senate.

On Friday the distinguished Senator from Nebraska claimed that to give the President this power was common sense. I asked him this question:

> I am wondering whether it is not common sense to adopt the Pittman amendment, which would virtually make the Senate a board of review as to the merits of any agreement or treaty?

His answer was, in substance, that for the Senate to retain that power would kill the whole measure "as dead as a doornail."

I cannot agree with the Senator in that conclusion. I believe that the people of this country have the same opinion about the Senate that Webster had when, on March 7, 1850, he said:

> It is fortunate that there is a Senate of the United States; a body not yet moved from its propriety, not lost to a just sense of its own dignity and its own high responsibilities, and a body to which this country looks with confidence for wise, moderate, patriotic, and healing counsels.

Mr. President, when did the executive branch of this Government become so dependable, and the Senate of the United States so undependable, that the Senate must delegate its powers to the Executive? Since becoming a Member of the United States Senate a year and 3 months ago, I have become very well acquainted with a number of my colleagues. I believe they are dependable men. I further believe that most of them are men who have graduated from the "university of hard knocks"—practical men, men with ideals and ideas. In this particular period I believe that the combined views of these men, who come from different sections of this great Nation, would provide a better standard to tie to than the judgment of the Executive or the State Department. Why? Because we have our feet on the ground. We are mixing daily with the common man, whom Abraham Lincoln said God Almighty must have loved because he made so many of them. Our eyes are not continually fixed on the "mirage of foreign trade." We know the problems of our constituents, and they know and we know that under present world conditions trade treaties will not provide a panacea for the economic ills within our own borders.

Mr. President, it has been said a number of times that since the passage of the original Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, we have entered into 22 reciprocal-trade pacts, and that only 3 of those pacts were not required to be ratified by legislative action of the foreign nations. Under what strange spell have we in America fallen, that we listen to the siren voice which suggests that the Senate of the United States should delegate its powers because it does not know what is for the welfare or best interests of our people?

Mr. President, in the history of Israel, there was a time when its people worshipped the golden calf. It was hung aloft so that the people could see it. In this argument there are those who have indicated a worship of the golden calf of legislation. I know that the word "reciprocity" has hypnotized many of our people. It has been hung aloft, and every virtue has been attributed to trade treaties. In spite of all the evidence to the contrary, partisans are almost willing to say that every virtue is tied to them. If we could strip off the veneer of this golden calf, we should find that there is nothing magical in trade treaties. The present discussion involves only the question whether or not we want to delegate to the Executive for the next 3 years the significant powers which have been discussed—powers involving treaties, taxation, and revenue. Personally, I believe that if they are delegated they will not be used because of the uncertainty of conditions and currencies abroad and because of the situation of agriculture and business within our own borders. Later, I shall have something further to say as to the workability of trade treaties during and after the World War.

Mr. President, the economic life of the Nation is built upon domestic and foreign trade. We are informed that our foreign trade does not exceed 10 percent of our total trade. Ever since the inception of this Government, our policy in relation to foreign trade has been of great significance in directing our progress.

The Tariff Act of 1789 was the first tariff legislation passed under the Constitution. Down through the years we have had our tariff squabbles. We have had great debates in Congress on the merits of the protective- and the free-trade systems.

The protective tariff had as its primary purpose building up American industry and making America an industrial Nation—a Nation producing manufactured products from raw materials, and in so doing creating good jobs.

We could spend hours in going into the "pros and cons" of the value of a protective tariff. We could bring into the discussion what the lowering of the tariff would do to the American standard of living. We could also bring into the discussion the arguments on behalf of free trade. But this would do us no particular good at this time, because the subject under discussion is the continuity of the new tariff procedure which was brought into being in 1934 largely through the efforts of Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State. I refer to the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934, which, for a period of 3 years, through the Department of State, gave to the President power to negotiate reciprocal-trade agreements with other nations, the idea being that such treaties or agreements would add impetus and volume to international trade, and in so doing stimulate our own trade and markets. As every Senator knows, the idea behind giving the President this authority was that by such agreements we could expand foreign markets for the products of the United States.

The delegation of authority to the President to change tariff rates, with the consent of the Senate, is not a new matter in our history. In 1897 the Dingley Act was passed, authorizing the President to negotiate similar agreements covering a limited group of imports. I am informed that both President Theodore Roosevelt and President McKinley negotiated agreements with a number of foreign countries under the Dingley Act; but all those reciprocal treaties received the approval of the Senate.

Under the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 the President was authorized to increase or decrease duties on any particular article when, on the basis of an investigation by the Tariff Commission, he found that the existing duties did not equal the difference between the costs of production in the United States and in the competing country.

As we all know, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act expired in 1937, at which time Congress renewed it for another 3 years. So today the question is, Shall we renew this authority of the President, or shall we amend the act to require Senate approval, or shall we defer action until the world again becomes sane?

Mr. President, I am not finding fault with the idea of reciprocal-trade treaties or agreements. Secretary Hull did not originate the idea. It came out of experience. In it is contained much common sense. This is a large country, a country of many sections, with a diversity of crops, a country of many mineral resources. Industrially and agriculturally, it is the most nearly self-sufficient country on the face of the globe—which means that we produce almost everything. When we trade or sell some of our products to foreign countries, they sell back to us products which compete with our home production. The idea is that by selling more of our goods we create more opportunities for labor. By adding economic flow to the economic current we contribute toward prosperity.

But unfortunately in many instances, as Senators have shown, the trade treaties have not operated in that way. The agreements are the result of human minds meeting—a group in the State Department and representatives of foreign nations—and, of course, the human mind is fallible. Therefore, in treaties such as that with Canada an escape clause or clauses provided in substance that either country, if it found that under the agreement domestic production of the article concerned was injuriously affected, or if a wide variation occurred in the rate of exchange between currencies, might take action to remedy that situation.

However, I invite attention to a challenging fact. I am informed that in these agreements more than a thousand commodities have been considered, but so infallible have been the master minds which negotiated the treaties that no advantage has been taken of the escape clause or clauses. Here, I believe, we have the reason for much of the opposition to the treaties. In other words, the servant has fallen asleep on the job. We know that a number of conferences have been held by the State Department at the instance of producers of this country. Remember, these producers are American citizens with rights and privileges. One of the great rights of a citizen is the right to petition his Government, and it is the obligation of the servant—the employee of Government—to pay attention when the citizen speaks. Yet out of all these hearings there has come no admission, even in one instance, that the State Department has been wrong.

After a great deal of pressure, a supplementary agreement was entered into with Canada with relation to fox furs, and a ceiling of 100,000 was placed on the number of fox furs that could be imported. That ceiling is much more than the normal importation, with the result that while it stopped a total inundation it did permit a partial one, with the result that in that industry American citizens have lost much money. My own State has been seriously affected.

Let us be frank about the whole situation. We are living in a topsy-turvy world; and if we are to continue the present trade policy—as it appears we are, because word has gone out from the White House to continue it—we must safeguard our American position so as to avoid any treaty arrangement which, under the direction of some State Department experts, will mutilate some of our American industries and further injure our farmers.

I have no personal feeling toward the employees of government—I myself am one—but I do have a feeling against some of the high-flying theorists, many of whom have never earned a dollar by the sweat of the brow, and who are always anxious to experiment with other people's money but not with their own. I have heard some of them argue that the thing to do would be to reduce all tariff barriers and let the goods of all the countries flow into the United States. In view of the topsy-turvy world we are in, let us proceed cautiously in reducing tariff rates. Some of us believe that is the Senate's business.

As I have said, a large majority of the present so-called reciprocal treaties were required to be approved by the legislative bodies of other nations. This fact should cause us to pause, especially in these times, when we see the executive arm in other nations taking all the power. If this law is to be continued, it must be borne in mind that it does not present a situation giving the President power in relation to specific items, but it gives him blanket authority to negotiate agreements relative to everything produced in this country.

The purpose of extension of our trade and commerce is a beneficial one; but to delegate that job to the Executive at this time might result in the diminution of our trade and commerce. We know that trade wars are unprofitable and that good will and friendly trade relations are much desired. Is not every Senator interested in furthering such trade and commerce? Some of us feel that under the fundamental law of the land it is the function of the Senate, after the President has formulated a treaty affecting the commercial interest of our people, to approve or disapprove such treaty or agreement.

Mr. President, there is nothing sacrosanct, mysterious, or obnoxious in the word "reciprocity." However, there is much misunderstanding of the real issues involved in this debate. There is an old saying that "figures don't lie, but liars will figure." In these times it has become the custom to do two things to sustain one's position: First, get together a lot of figures or statistics; second, get a group of experts on one's side.

As I see the situation, we need neither of these factors to back up either position taken in this debate. Why? Because, in the first place, when the figures which are produced for or against the reciprocal-trade treaties are examined, they cannot be said to be conclusive proof of the contentions made. The reason is that so many other factors are involved. I have already mentioned some of them—world unrest, war, currency instability, and so forth.

Secondly, we do not need the experts, because they are partisans who draw their conclusions from the figures which they produce to sustain their position.

Mr. President, it is interesting to note how many distinguished Senators have changed front on this issue, although I must say that the experts and the figures have had nothing to do with the change. The distinguished junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] showed that a number of Democratic Senators—including the present Secretary of State—opposed the policy embodied in the joint resolution when the Republicans were in power.

This change is unimportant, except that it seems to me that, after all, politics appears to play a part in fundamental matters as well as in superficial matters. I was interested in the remarks of the junior Senator from Nevada today on that very issue. He said that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act would not have been passed had it not been definitely understood that there would be no change in the excise duties on copper and other commodities. I cannot conceive how Senators who would be against the idea of giving the President power to negotiate agreements of this kind in times of peace can now favor giving him this power in a time of great world crisis.

Mr. President, if the question were simply an academic one—Do you favor reciprocal treaties or agreements between nations?—I believe we could answer that question generally in this way: We believe in fair dealing between fair men; we believe in fair dealing between nations which want to deal honorably and fairly, but we believe also that this Government, in its foreign economic policy, must give realistic consideration to the situation which now obtains throughout the world.

Let us keep clearly in mind the point that until the advent of the present administration every reciprocal treaty was approved by the Senate. If, in times of peace, such reciprocal agreements or treaties worked beneficially to the contracting parties, but were required to be confirmed or ratified by the Senate, I ask, Is there not more reason than ever, in these troubled times, for treaties which affect the economic life of this Nation to have the approval of the Senate or Congress?

In approaching this problem, we must analyze it coolly, with the idea foremost in our thoughts of safeguarding America and American interests.

Mr. President, only yesterday there appeared in the press something which I do not believe, something which I believe is the result of Nazi propaganda. However, it is pertinent to the subject I am discussing. In approaching this problem we must bear in mind, first and foremost, the safeguarding of America and American interests. I cannot believe that our representatives abroad, or the President in this country, made any such commitment as was intimated in the dispatches from Berlin; but I do know that in this country of ours there are those who are so shot through with their interest in foreign affairs that their eyes are blinded to American affairs. If those men hold office, then, in the words of a gentleman from the other body, they should be "brought to time." This country is our heritage; this is our mint to look after, and we had better not become involved in looking after foreign problems. So, Mr. President, I repeat that in approaching this problem we have to analyze it coolly, with the idea foremost in our thoughts of safeguarding America and American interests. Having this thought in mind and applying it does not make us less constructive in our relations with the rest of the world. The security and the welfare of the American people should be first. We realize, especially under normal circumstances, that we must seek to develop trade with other nations.

But, I repeat, Europe and Asia are at war. Force rules nations. Treaties are disregarded. Perhaps we are seeing a change in the world order. The balance of power is in the balance. We must also realize that in this changing world there appears to be more and more contempt for democratic processes—yes; for democratic ideas. With what result? The rules of the game are changing. I mean the political and economic rules applicable to international relations. No one can doubt this statement.

If, in 1934 and 1937, before the world went mad, Congress thought it advisable to give the President the power to negotiate all reciprocal agreements or treaties, that is no reason why that power should be continued. The power was given before Mars had raised his fiery head, before President Roosevelt had made his Chicago speech, and there are now 22 treaties, or reciprocal agreements, in force which will continue to be in force until either one or both of the nations who are parties thereto elect, under the terms of the treaties, to abrogate them.

In spite of all the propaganda—and there has been plenty of it on both sides—I think this whole matter can be simplified. The human mind has a tendency to complicate everything coming within its grasp. I take it that every Senator has had communications from this group and that group, indicating that someone has asked them to write letters requesting Senators to support the President's bill or not to support it. What is the nature of the pending joint resolution? It simply provides:

Resolved, etc., That the period during which the President is authorized to enter into foreign trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by the act (Public, No. 316, 73d Cong.) approved June 12, 1934, is hereby extended for a further period of 3 years from June 12, 1940.

It will be noticed that the joint resolution does not even mention that most significant word "reciprocal"; it merely uses the words "foreign trade agreements." Yet the whole propaganda in favor of this program has been built around the word "reciprocity." Everywhere, in every little country town, in every village and every organization the suggestion has been "support the reciprocity agreements," and that is the way it comes to Washington.

As all the Senators know, there is a question whether these agreements are treaties within the provision of article II, section 2, of the Constitution which provides:

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Is the Trade Agreements Act constitutional? There has been so much said on that subject that I shall not spend a great deal of time on it; but it appears to me it all depends on whether or not the Supreme Court shall say that these instruments which we are trying to give the President power to go ahead and negotiate are treaties or are merely agreements. Bearing in mind the provision of the Constitution just read, it seems to me that if we pass this measure we are attempting to delegate to the President power which we cannot delegate.

Then there is the objection that under the provisions of the Trade Agreements Act the President is given authority to raise or lower duties by 50 percent, but the act provides no standard to guide the Executive. I understand that amendments are to be offered which will provide standards. If such amendments should be attached to the bill, the objection to which I have alluded would be obviated. The Supreme Court has held that the delegation of power by Congress without adequate standards is unconstitutional. The argument of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], to which I listened the other day, seems to me to be absolutely unanswerable and unanswered. The House has seen fit, in its vote on this measure, to abandon to the President its functions of initiating revenue laws, but Congress cannot delegate the constitutional provision with regard to treaties.

That brings to mind the question, Why has not the act been declared unconstitutional by the Court during the last 6 years? That question has been asked on the floor of the Senate. Here it appears the act itself denies the manufacturer or producer the remedy allowed by section 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930, and no one could probably prove an injury because of a reduced duty which was not common to the people generally. That is the answer to the question.

It is claimed that the history of these treaties in the last 6 years demonstrates clearly the value of the program, in that it is said that there has been a 97-percent increase in our export trade from 1932 to 1939.

On the other hand, it is claimed by those who oppose the continuance of this power that our exports increased primarily as a result of world recovery and would have taken place if the trade-agreements program had not been put into effect.

That brings up the question of what this program has done for industry.

Figures issued by the Department of Commerce show that agricultural exports in 1939 were 1 percent below agricultural exports in 1932, the bottom year of the depression, although over this same period exports of United States merchandise increased 98 percent. We also find that agricultural exports in 1939 were 12 percent below agricultural exports in 1935. So, apparently, if we take the figures as a basis, the program has not benefited the farmer.

The fact that agricultural surpluses have accumulated shows that the farmer has not been getting any benefit from these treaties. Furthermore, the facts show that with countries with whom we have had treaties, exports have increased but four and one-half times, while from 1935 to 1938 exports to nontreaty countries increased nearly nine times. Our foremost important export agricultural products are cotton, tobacco, wheat, and pork. From 1935 to 1938 exports of hams, shoulders, and bacon to countries with whom we had treaties actually declined 9.5 percent, while exports to other countries with whom we had no treaties increased 4.6 percent; and in the case of cotton, from 1935 to 1938 our exports declined 22 percent.

One of the purposes of the act was to regulate the admission of foreign goods into the United States "in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production." Has this been carried out?

I feel that this language, so far as my State of Wisconsin is concerned, has been forgotten. Does this country need to import meat, milk, butter, cream, and cheese? Is there need for the importation of fox furs? Or do we fail to produce enough of these things to satisfy our home demand? The answer is an emphatic "No." We know that the dairy farmer needs the American market. The fox-fur farmers need the American market.

In general, I feel that the Department of State has not done the job it could have done. It has not exercised, in many instances, where it should have done so, its rights under the escape clauses. It has made agreements that relate to over a thousand items, and yet it has not seen fit to admit that it was wrong in any case. If this act should be continued in force, as I presume it will be, I think that some consideration should be given to helping those who might be injured by the operation of the act.

There is no question that the reciprocity agreements have benefited certain groups in our economy—that is, the foreign trade has benefited them—and there is no question that it has harmed other groups. This is due probably to the fact that we are a large nation and produce a great variety of things. We are the most self-sufficient Nation on earth.

Mr. President, what would happen if the President's power to negotiate so-called reciprocal-trade agreements should not be extended? Well, the present agreements would continue unimpaired; and there are, I believe, 22 in existence. The President's power, however, would not be curtailed to negotiate any new treaties. If we should not extend the President's power under the Trade Agreements Act, he could negotiate just the same. The only difference would be that the treaties or agreements thus negotiated would have to come back to the Senate for ratification or rejection.

Then there is the so-called Norris argument that we should confer the power upon the President so that if in the future there should be an opportunity to make effective agreements he should be in a position to do so. I have partially answered that argument, but, answering it further, let me say that it seems to me we must realize that under the Trade Agreements Act the President is given the power to reduce the tariff rate, but once a trade treaty becomes operative, it has, because of the favored-nation clause, the effect of giving other nations the right to the same reduction of tariff rates.

I remember that the other day the effect of that clause was very clearly illustrated by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who showed how Russia got the benefit of a most-favored-nation clause in a treaty we negotiated with another nation. There are numerous instances of the way in which that clause works, and it works detrimentally to American producers.

The future holds some very difficult problems. I wish everyone in this country would realize this fact, especially the persons who are going to have something to do about getting America interested in dealing with foreign nations after the war is over. When the war is over our market, which is the best market in the world, will be the target for every nation, if we permit it.

I should like to see the State Department concentrate upon protective measures that will protect America against the onslaughts of the future trade of these nations. The trade wars of the future will present plenty of problems for us to solve. Europe, without credit or gold, will have to barter with us. Whether we like it or not, because we are living in a neighborhood world, we shall have to adopt some of the self-sufficiency ideas of the Old World.

Much was said today by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] which applies directly to that point. I want Senators to bear in mind that no one has claimed at any time that our maximum foreign trade ever exceeded 10 percent of our total trade; and yet we are talking all the time about protecting the 10 percent. Ten percent. What about thinking a little bit of how to protect the 90 percent?

These are questions which cannot be answered by statistics for or against trade agreements. Statistics are valuable if they are properly utilized; but we cannot use statistics as a yardstick to measure the effectiveness or ineffectiveness of a trade treaty when we know that the results obtained are the product of many factors, such as war with its changed demands, drought, flood, gold purchases, change in labor costs, material costs, change in tariff walls, blockades, new methods of production, and so forth. Therefore we must not be misled, as so many persons seem to permit themselves to be, by statistics, because they are inadequate and misleading.

That brings us to another consideration. What about the war situation and the economic situation in Europe? Will they have any influence on the reciprocity treaties?

The warring powers with which we have had treaties have exercised their right under the treaties to do that which they could not do under the treaties in case they were at peace. However, the situation will be far more serious after the war. We all know that Europe's gold will be here in America, and a great deal of the Allies' American investments will have returned home. After the war we may find all nations doing what Germany has had to do—engage in barter.

The war is forcing Great Britain and France into the same kind of an economy that Germany is in. If Germany should win the war, the situation would be bad indeed. All we have to do to appreciate the truth of this statement is to realize the kind of peace that would be imposed upon the vanquished. Look at Czechslovakia and Poland and Finland. We have already said to England and France and the rest of the world that we want gold or its equivalent, and nothing else. No foreign nation will have gold, so we may expect ruthless competition, even such as Germany has been carrying on, in all the markets of the world. Then, if we are dependent upon foreign trade, we shall be in a bad fix, because our economy with high labor costs and with high prices free from Government control will have to compete in a world of totalitarian economics based on controlled wages, government-fixed and adjusted prices, currency managed internationally, and trade by barter. The question is whether or not a reciprocity-agreement policy can be effective in any degree under such circumstances. I have not heard that argument met on this floor, nor have I read anywhere that anyone has attempted to argue that the policy would be effective at such a time.

My suggestion is that we quit fiddling around, quit thinking so much about foreign conditions, and realize that we have a great opportunity to put our house in order domestically. We have to consider, of course, world economic realities, but we must also count our own blessings and utilize all the economic values that we have in the Western Hemisphere.

I repeat, the principle of reciprocity is sound, but it is only as sound as that embodied in any other trade. If you go into a store and trade your dollar for an article that is worth the dollar, you have engaged in a reciprocal or mutual transaction. Such a deal is fair, and both parties benefit by it. Not only the storekeeper, but the manufacturer and the laborer in America who produced the article have benefited. But if you go into a store and buy an article not manufactured in America—an article which could be manufactured here, and an article which comes into direct competition with one manufactured in America—you have, unless there is some compensating benefit, interfered with the American workman who could produce the domestic product; you have interfered with the factory; and it may be that you bought the article for 90 cents because it was produced abroad at a cheaper labor cost and a cheaper material cost, with the result that even the American concern had to sell its product down to 90 cents. I know this is not a complete analogy, but it has more than a grain of truth in it.

Yes, Mr. President, foreign trade is important, but it is not so important that we should lose our perspective; or, putting the matter in the vernacular of the street, we should not, because of our foreign trade, lose the coat, vest, and pants of our domestic trade.

Judging by the vote on Friday, it seems likely that the measure we are discussing will become law. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, and I realize that it is dangerous to engage in the role of a prophet; but I am going to take the risk. I am going to hazard a few guesses as to what the results will be. They are as follows:

First. During the war no appreciable damage or benefit will result from the extension of the power of the President.

Second. If the war ceases within the 3 years, and then the power is exercised by the President, considerable damage will result to our own economy if new treaties are entered into by a President who is free-trade-minded or foreign-minded.

Third. Many of the present treaties will have to be abrogated or amended after the war, and even before the war ceases, to protect our economy.

Mr. President, I conclude as follows:

First. I believe we should not attempt to delegate to the President the treaty power, the tariff power, and the internal taxing power.

Second. We should not keep on conferring more power on the Executive. The people want this march toward economic dictatorship by the President stopped. It was never contemplated by the founders of the Republic that the Executive should have other than executive power.

Third. By refusing to pass this joint resolution in these perilous and changing times, the Senate will serve notice on America that we are aware of our high responsibilities, and that very act will open the door for a return of confidence and economic healing.

During the delivery of Mr. WILEY's address:

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. A statement was recently made on the floor of the Senate with respect to the time consumed in the consideration of the tariff law. It was said that it consumed practically the whole session.

I note on page 3674 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 29, 1940, that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] interrupted the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to remind him and the Senate that the present tariff law was begun in the House of Representatives in December 1928 and was passed and signed finally by the President in June 1930, taking 19 months, in the two Houses, to write a tariff law.

The object of this interruption was to point to the possibility of great time consumption should we make mandatory the submission of tariff trade agreements to the Senate for ratification.

The Senator from Kentucky, however, did not tell us that during the 19 months he said elapsed between the inception and approval of that act, Congress in the same period, and in addition to the Tariff Act, passed 89 private acts, 109 public resolutions, and 378 public acts. Neither did he indicate the relatively small number of items in a trade agreement when placed in comparison with a major revision of the tariff, with its thousands of items and its highly controversial administrative features, nor the 235 yea-and-nay votes in the Senate alone, all of which constitute a magnitude that no trade agreement could possibly attain.

The Trade Agreement Act was approved June 12, 1934, and it has taken nearly 6 years to negotiate and put into effect 22 agreements; and the total of items negotiated does not approach the number in the Tariff Act of 1930.

The comparison chosen by the Senator from Kentucky—the Tariff Act of 1930—was not entirely appropriate, for that legislation was made the target of attack by the Democratic Party to a greater extent than any prior act. Senators will recall the "smear" campaign against it by a highly paid Democratic specialist; and they will recall that after the bill had been pending in the Senate for 6 months, the then Senator from Utah, Mr. Smoot, placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1930, on page 4612, a statement of time consumed on the tariff bill, which I will read:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection I send to the desk and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD the result of an examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from September 4, 1929, the date on which the pending tariff bill was reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee, to February 25, 1930. That examination discloses approximately 2,638 pages containing the actual debate on the tariff bill. Of this total, the space in the RECORD is divided approximately as follows:

Democrats, 1,108 pages.

Insurgents, 738½ pages.

The Official Reporters of the Senate state that each page in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD represents approximately 12 minutes of debate. Thus expressed, the relative amount of time consumed by each group during the period mentioned is set forth in the statement, which I ask to be printed entire in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement entire is as follows:

"An examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from September 4, 1929, the date the pending tariff bill (H. R. 2667) was reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee, to February 25, 1930, discloses that approximately 2,638 pages contain the actual debate on the tariff bill.

"Of this total, the space is divided approximately as follows:

"Democrats, 1,108 pages.

"Insurgents, 738½ pages."

"The Official Reporters of the Senate state that each page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD represents approximately 12 minutes of debate. Thus expressed, the relative amount of time consumed by each group during the period above mentioned is as follows: Democrats, 221 hours, or 42 percent; Republicans, 158 hours, or 30 percent; insurgents, 148 hours, or 28 percent."

The chronological history of the Tariff Act of 1930 (H. R. 2667) is as follows:

Ways and Means hearings, January 7, 1929, to February 25, 1929.

Introduced in House and referred, May 7, 1929.

Reported to House, May 9, 1929.

Passed the House, May 28, 1929.

Received and referred in Senate, May 29, 1929.

Reported to the Senate, September 4, 1929.

Passed the Senate, March 24, 1930.

Conference report adopted in Senate, June 13, 1930.

Conference report adopted in House, June 14, 1930.

Approved by the President, June 17, 1930.

I thought the Senator from Wisconsin would like to have the history of the debate and the time consumed in the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley tariff measure.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. I am sure he has done a real job.

After the conclusion of Mr. WILEY's speech—

WHITE BOOK PUBLISHED BY GERMAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have listened with interest, as I always do, to what the able junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] had to say; but I was particularly interested in the portion of his address in which he digressed to mention a situation which has arisen within the past several days as a result of the publication of the so-called White Papers.

Mr. President, in my opinion the publication of the so-called White Book by the German Government imposes a very definite duty upon the Senate, regardless of our individual opinions as to the authenticity of the documents reproduced therein.

I believe we here have a duty to perform because Mr. Bullitt is Ambassador to France by virtue of the fact that upon the recommendation of the President we voted to confirm his nomination. The same state of facts applies to Mr. Kennedy, our Ambassador to the Court of St. James's. Let me add also, Mr. President, that not so long ago we confirmed the nomination of Mr. Cromwell as Minister to Canada; and recently Mr. Cromwell publicly stated substantially the same things that Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Kennedy are alleged to have privately stated, according to the Polish documents published by the German Government.

In my opinion it is our immediate business to institute a searching inquiry into the conversations of Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Bullitt is here in the United States. Before he takes the plane for Europe, I suggest that he be required to appear before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and testify under oath as to the truth or falsity of the serious allegations made by the German Government. If the State Department demands it, let the examination of Mr. Bullitt be conducted behind closed doors, but examine him we should. The American people are entitled to all obtainable information pertaining to these charges.

In connection with this examination, let us request the State Department to supply us with authenticated copies of the public addresses made by Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Kennedy, and also by Mr. Cromwell.

Mr. President, we cannot ignore this incident. The parents of the boys who some think must die on foreign battlefields to finish other people's wars are going to hold us responsible if we do not take appropriate action to correct a menacing situation.

The most deplorable fact about this matter is that even if the documents published in the German White Paper are branded as forgeries, or possibly proved to be forgeries, any man can say, and many are already saying, that these interviews, or alleged interviews, sound very much like many things we have heard over the radio from many people in high office from time to time. That cannot be denied.

For example, on October 5, 1937, the President made an address in which he said:

The peace-loving nations must make a concerted effort in opposition to those violations of treaties and those ignorings of humane instincts which today are creating a state of international anarchy and instability from which there is no escape through mere isolation or neutrality.

That statement, Mr. President, was a clear and precise expression of opinion that the United States cannot escape involvement in an European controversy through isolation or neutrality.

The President said further, in the same speech:

There is a solidarity and an interdependence about the modern world, both technically and morally, which makes it impossible for any nation completely to isolate itself from economic and political upheavals in the rest of the world, especially when such upheavals appear to be spreading and not declining.

And again, the President said:

I am compelled and you are compelled, nevertheless, to look ahead. The peace, the freedom, and the security of 90 percent of the population of the world is being jeopardized by the remaining 10 percent who are threatening a break-down of all international order and law. Surely the 90 percent who want to live in peace under law and in accordance with moral standards which have received almost universal acceptance through the centuries, can and must find some way to make their will prevail.

Now, Mr. President, although the Secretary of State has repudiated any association with the policies which it is alleged our diplomats sponsored in conversations, he cannot escape the logical conclusions which must be drawn from a paragraph in his letter of September 2, 1938, to the Foreign Minister of Peru. Let me read what he said on that date:

Events in other parts of the world have emphasized recently the extent to which some nations have wavered from the orderly and friendly relations which should prevail between neighbors. The nations of the world are faced with the issue of determining whether relations shall be characterized by international anarchy and lawlessness or by the principles of fair play, justice, and order under law. No nation and no government can avoid the issue; neither can any nation avoid participation, willing or not, in the responsibility of determining whch course of action shall prevail.

Mr. President, there is an unfortunate misconception in the minds of many people that the executive branch of the Government has unlimited power to conduct the foreign relations of the United States as it sees fit. The fact of the matter is that the Constitution of the United States, by the first section of article I, conferred all legislative powers upon the Congress, which it decrees should consist of the Senate and House of Representatives. The Constitution confers the sole power on the Congress to declare war, in subsection 2 of section 8 of article I. That tells the story. The Congress alone has the power to involve the Nation in war. And note well the final subsection of this section 8. Let me read it.

The Congress shall have power * * * To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to pile proof upon proof that the Congress is the master of all executive agencies of this Government. But let me point out as a final word on this particular point that the very fact that the Constitution provides, in article II, section 2, that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, demonstrates conclusively our right to participate in the conduct of the foreign relations of the United States.

Mr. President, I take it that no one in this body will deny that the Congress of the United States is the voice of the people, subject only to the limitation that all powers not specifically delegated to the Federal Government are reserved to the States and to the people.

The American people are jarred by the revelations in these documents. As I have said before, unfortunately it is impossible to dissociate them, whether they be true or false, from public pronouncements by many officials or the executive branch of our Government. The American people want to keep out of war. The people want to be assured that neither this administration nor any succeeding administration will lead them into war by surreptitious engagements or otherwise. We have the power, Mr. President, to give this reassurance. I call upon my colleagues to join with me in the assertion of our prerogative to control the destiny of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it be read by the clerk.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 238) disclaiming intention of the Government to interfere in international controversies or domestic concerns of European, Asiatic, or African powers, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Government of the United States disclaims any desire or intention to interfere in the international controversies or domestic concerns of any European, Asiatic, or African power, and will recognize the de facto government in control of any area therein located as the legitimate government of that area, and will seek to promote friendly intercourse therewith, provided such government respects the rights of American citizens, observes good faith in its international relations, and refrains from any attempt to extend its territory, system of government, or political ideology to any portion of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, it is entirely unnecessary for me to consume the time of this body to bring to its attention, or to the attention of the individual Members thereof, the gravity of the situation which now exists, particularly that pertaining to the United States of America, because for several days headlines on the front pages of virtually every newspaper in the United States have appeared over articles relative thereto. In addition, I may add, there have been innumerable editorials pertaining to the controversy which is raging now as to the truth or falsity of the allegations made by the German Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Without objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the American people are entitled to know, by way of record, by way of a congressional inquiry, by way of statements made under oath, as to whether or not the statements made by the German Government are to be believed, as to whether or not statements made by the German Government are false or true.

In substantiation of the great amount of publicity that this matter has been given, I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at this point, an article entitled "United States Envoys' Activities Are Criminal, Nazis Say."

Of course, the American people make denial of that statement, but we make denial of it upon the assumption that no representatives of ours would deal with or indulge in conversations such as revealed by the White Book released by the German Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of April 1, 1940]

UNITED STATES ENVOYS' ACTIVITIES ARE CRIMINAL, NAZIS SAY

BERLIN, April 1.—The Diplomatic and Political Correspondence, German Foreign Office newspaper, which joined in an angry press campaign, today said activities of American diplomatic representatives in Europe, as alleged in an official White Book, had been "dangerous and even criminal."

"It is surprising, and even monstrous," said the publication, "that official diplomatic representatives of a power which fundamentally since Washington and Monroe, has opposed interference in the affairs of foreign countries were irresponsible enough to stimuluate the danger of conflict between third powers.

"TRAGIC IN EFFECT

"Tragic in their effect are the reports of Polish diplomats to Warsaw regarding the readiness of American diplomats, by intervention in London, to close up existing gaps.

"The methods of these American amateur diplomats are all the more inconceivable since the neutrality laws of their country must have told them that their actions were diametrically opposed to the standpoint of their country.

"The willfullness of these representatives, which cannot be excused solely on the grounds of dilettantism, and which has caused unending damages to Berlin in the past, remains a factor with which foreign nations, and also the American people, must reckon."

MORE HEADLINES

Newspapers continued to display sensationally the allegations in the White Book which the foreign office published as representing diplomatic papers found in Polish archives in Warsaw after the German occupation.

Voelkischer Beobachter, official Nazi Party newspaper, centered its attack on William C. Bullitt, American Ambassador to France. On page 1 it printed an article with the headline: "Bullitt's shattered plan: War between Germany and Russia followed by English, French, and American attack from the rear on weakened Germany."

Mr. REYNOLDS. In order that the situation may be clear for those who do me the honor to listen and for the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I ask that there be published at this point in the RECORD a very excellent article from the pen of W. A. Hildebrand, the Washington correspondent of the Daily News of Greensboro, N. C., bearing date March 30, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

REYNOLDS WILL ASK PROBE OF NAZI CHARGES

(By W. A. Hildebrand)

WASHINGTON, March 30.—Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, of North Carolina, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and likewise active in the work of the Military Affairs Committee, was in Paris last September 3 when at 11 o'clock in the forenoon Great Britain declared war on Germany, the Polish affair having served as the casus belli, and France issued mobilization orders a few hours later.

Predicating his view on what he saw and heard upon that historic occasion, Senator REYNOLDS is persuaded that, in fairness to the American people, the current disclosures by the publishers of the German White Book should be made the subject of a thorough and prompt Senate investigation.

THOROUGH INQUIRY

Senator REYNOLDS feels that this should be done, and a thoroughgoing inquiry made without reference to the developments in Berlin, where it is declared that another and more sensational chapter will presently be made available which will establish beyond question the accuracy and authenticity of the documents seized from Polish foreign office files when the Germans entered Warsaw. According to the alleged documentary evidence the American Ambassador to France, William E. Bullitt, and the Ambassador to England, Joseph Kennedy, were guilty of what the Nazis call warmongering, that Bullitt in particular encouraged Poland to refuse a settlement of the Danzig and the Polish Corridor problems by peaceful negotiation, and implied in frequent conversations that this country would participate in any war that Great Britain and France might see fit to start. Bullitt is now preparing to return to his Paris post, but Senator REYNOLDS thinks he should be required to remain here for questioning by a Senate committee.

SHOULD BROADEN SCOPE

At the instance of Senator CLARK of Missouri, the Foreign Relations Committee has reported out a resolution designed to insure an inquiry into foreign propaganda, but Senator REYNOLDS thinks the scope of this inquiry should be broadened to embrace an inquiry relative to the activity of our own envoys that have been assigned to foreign governments. Visitors who were, perforce, in Paris in the early days of the war in Europe observed as much excitement, and heard as much talk in the American Embassy as was to be observed in the French foreign office. In Government circles they were more diplomatic about it, but the men on the Paris streets were soon convinced that Washington would join in a declaration of war against Germany that it was found impossible to disabuse their minds. Once more they have progressed to the point of referring to us as Uncle Shylock, interested solely in the ideas of cash on the barrel head; but they still want Uncle Shylock to produce the money and materials that Bullitt is said to have talked about. In today's edition of the New York Times, Anne O'Hare McCormick, writing from London, says American visitors to England "are immediately struck by the growing irritation toward America, partly a reflex of American irritation toward the British, but mostly arising from the disappointment after widespread expectation that the United States was sure to enter the war."

FEARS INVOLVEMENT

Senator REYNOLDS found this widespread expectation, that this country would be "sure" to enter the war, and he very greatly fears, surveying events since his sojourn in Europe, that this country is, in point of fact, being drawn gradually but inexorably toward the western front, or toward the Rhine, which some of our officials are understood to regard as the American frontier.

Once the Hull reciprocal trade agreements extension resolution is disposed of, Senator REYNOLDS expects to introduce his resolution to investigate at once the documentary evidence presented in the German White Book, which purports to link the American envoys in Paris and London to the events leading up to the war in Europe. All the way through President Roosevelt was connected with these disclosures by inference, and in any event there is a feeling here that Secretary Hull has on his hands some more Cromwell cases, which presumably call for more reprimands.

Since Sumner Wells, the Undersecretary of State, has just returned from Berlin, where he talked with Hitler and foreign office officials, Senator REYNOLDS thinks it would be in order to send another man back there on a "fact-finding mission," or that the German Government should be asked for proof of the White Book contents.

WOULD WIDEN DOCTRINE

Having made the investigation he will request, Senator REYNOLDS thinks it would be wise to go further and by formal resolution declare it to be the sense of the Senate that the Monroe Doctrine should be given world-wide application. If this doctrine is to be maintained for the Western Hemisphere, then Senator REYNOLDS feels that the converse of this policy should be recognized, and that we should once more heed the admonition of George Washington to avoid foreign entanglements. Under such a policy other nations would be granted the right to maintain Monroe Doctrines and spheres of influence, all this being no concern of this Nation, whatever American envoys to foreign governments may think about it.

Senator REYNOLDS said today that he had noted that the Chamberlain government is now asking the help of nations at least nominally neutral not to aid in making the world safe for democracy, but in an effort to establish a New World order, which appears to be a grandiose commercial or business affair. H. G. Wells, the English historian, says it contemplates nothing more than an attempt to keep intact the British and French Empires. But whatever the merits of the scheme, whether Wells and his liberal associates, or the British Foreign Office, are right, Senator REYNOLDS thinks this country should remain aloof from all this Old World scheming, and from their never-ending conflict over territory, raw materials, and the spoils of war generally.

The difficulties certain to attend the effort of the common people of this country to keep out of the European conflict are perhaps given additional emphasis by the disclosures of the German White Book, disclosures which may influence the entire world situation despite diplomatic denials. And then there is the circumstance that the entire American economy is rapidly being geared to the European war. A Franco-British coordinating committee is promising to spend a billion dollars for American-made bombers, dollar exchange which might otherwise have been used, in part, in the purchase of American-grown tobacco and fruits.

FISH WANTS PROBE—MIGHT ASK BULLITT IMPEACHMENT

WASHINGTON, March 30.—Representative FISH, Republican, New York, said tonight that he would demand a complete investigation of the German White Book and would seek impeachment of Ambassador William C. Bullitt "if the facts warrant."

In a radio address FISH said that President Roosevelt and Bullitt owed the American people "a categorical and detailed answer" to every charge made in the book.

It was no answer, he said, "to raise the hue and cry of 'propaganda' or to sprinkle a few grains of salt on its tail."

Asked about the charges at his press conference, President Roosevelt suggested that all propaganda from Europe be taken with several grains of salt. Bullitt, the Ambassador to France, also used the salt phrase in denying conversations attributed to him.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask that that be followed by an admirable editorial which I observed yesterday in the columns of the Washington (D. C.) Post, entitled "The Element of Truth."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post]

THE ELEMENT OF TRUTH

It would be pleasant to feel that the issue of the Polish diplomatic documents, made public in Berlin, has been disposed of by Mr. Hull's statement that he pays not "the slightest credence" to the statements attributed to American diplomats therein.

Unfortunately, memory recalls that only a week ago Mr. Hull found it necessary to rebuke our Minister to Canada for a speech which contravened standing instructions to American diplomatic officers. And there will be many who may be disposed to conclude that where one political ambassador is indiscreet, others have been the same.

It will be noticed that the German disclosures concentrate on statements attributed to two noncareer diplomats. Ambassador Bullitt denies their accuracy, and Ambassador Kennedy, who seems less implicated, may be expected to do likewise. But the sad part of the affair is that the excerpts so far published sound plausible.

And they sound plausible because Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Kennedy, as personal appointees of the President, are known to be in a different category from that of our responsible career diplomats. Considering all the circumstances of their appointments, it would be extraordinary if they did not to some extent regard themselves as personal envoys of Mr. Roosevelt, owing allegiance to him, rather than to the scrupulous regulations and carefully disciplined professional practice of the Department of State.

That is why there is something unsatisfactory in Secretary Hull's insistence that "the statements alleged have not represented in any way, at any time, the thought or the policy of the American Government."

Undoubtedly that is the literal truth. But the whole truth must include suspicion that the alleged statements might well have represented the personal thought and policy of the President, as distinct from that of the administration. And this, it will be noticed, is all that the documents claim.

The German Government has accomplished a very subtle piece of propaganda by the publication of these documents. And, false or true, their effect is not to be minimized. The object, on the one hand, is clearly to make the British and French people believe that the United States egged them into war even though this country had no intention of risking anything in the struggle. And, on the other hand, the Nazis seek to persuade Americans, shortly prior to the Presidential election, that the administration was willing to take sides in the German-Polish quarrel in a way scarcely consistent with complete neutrality.

There is just enough truth in both of these clever insinuations to make them difficult to laugh off. And the propaganda which is built on an element of truth is the really dangerous propaganda. So it would be idle to pretend that Dr. Goebbels has failed to score.

As the subtlety of this propaganda is realized, its damage will be repaired. But from this incident, as from that of the Cromwell speech, a permanent moral stands clear. The sooner all our diplomatic posts are filled from the career service, the sooner there is a final end to the custom of sending personal envoys of the President to represent this country in foreign capitals, the better for the welfare of the United States.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in concluding let me say that we all know that Mr. Sumner Welles, who was dispatched to Europe by the State Department, assumedly at the request of the administration itself, for the purpose of ascertaining the status of matters over there, has but recently returned. The American people were greatly interested in knowing why such a mission was sent. We were told by some officials, and some representatives of the press stated, that he went there for the purpose of endeavoring to bring about peace, which the whole world desires, but later it was revealed that his mission, unfortunately, was not for that purpose. Then it was said that he went there for the purpose of suggesting to the warring nations of the world a disarmament program after the war had ended, and I then and many others were sorry that he had not gone there for the purpose of making a suggestion that the warring nations of the world disarm now before the slaughter began.

Mr. Welles has returned. The American people are extremely desirous of ascertaining from Mr. Welles personally information as to where he went, with whom he talked, when he talked, what he said, and what was said to him. This is no time for secret diplomacy. If we must have a house in Europe I insist that we have a glass house in order that all may see and in order that all may know what is in it.

I say that the seriousness of the situation calls for Mr. Welles, through the State Department, or orally before the Foreign Relations Committee, to make a statement in full and candidly to the American people as to what he found the situation to be, insofar as the American interests are concerned, because the American people, particularly the mothers, now are more concerned as to whether or not their sons will be sent to bleed and die upon the fields of Europe to save the British Empire than they are interested in anything else.

Everywhere I have been in this country for the past several months from time to time the American mothers are saying that they hear the British are sending a million young Frenchmen to their death to save the British Empire, and the American mothers now want to know, and demand to know, whether or not the United States is to send its sons abroad to create a new order in world affairs, because that is now the "come on" cry.

During the World War it was said we were to go over there for the purpose of saving democracy, saving Christianity, and ending all war for all time, but the American people, fortunately, have gotten wise to that, and the new "come on" cry is "Join us, for there must be a new world order."

Mr. President, I say that the American people will not be satisfied until they ascertain the truth or the falsity of the statements which are being made by the Berlin Government; and, therefore, while Mr. Bullitt is in this country I think we should have the opportunity of directing inquiries to him under oath before the Foreign Relations Committee, or some other committee, as to whether or not these statements are true or false, in order that the American people—who after all pay the taxes—and the American mothers—who after all give of their blood—should know.

In that connection Mr. Welles, as I stated, should tell us with whom he talked, and what they had to say. We want no secret diplomacy now.

At this juncture and in conclusion, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I received from a gentleman who lives in Glen Burnie, Md., which reads as follows:

GLEN BURNIE, MD., March 31, 1940.

Senator R. REYNOLDS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

My family and I are in complete accord with your attitude that all facts in connection with Sumner Welles' European visit be made publicly known at once, keeping in mind it is a Government for the people, of the people, by the people. I ask if it is for the good of the people the secrecy surrounding the past and present activities of the administration in connection with foreign affairs, Above all we must not become involved in war.

W. E. OSTERTAG.

In view of the fact that he says he has a family, I am ready to assume that his good wife was more thoroughly interested in that matter than many others who have no sons who will be called upon to give their blood in the future.

In connection with my resolution I ask that there be printed in the RECORD part of page 402, all of page 403, and part of page 404, a portion of the address of President Monroe made on December 12, 1823, and there is one paragraph which I should like to be provided the opportunity of reading now, and then I shall have concluded:

Our policy in regard to Europe—

I said that I read this in connection with my resolution—which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none.

Mr. President, I ask that the portions of President Monroe's message of December 2, 1823, to which I referred, being on page 402 to 404, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The excerpt from President Monroe's message is as follows:

It was stated at the commencement of the last session that a great effort was then making in Spain and Portugal to improve the condition of the people of those countries and that it appeared to be conducted with extraordinary moderation. It need scarcely be remarked that the result has been so far very different from what was then anticipated. Of events in that quarter of the globe with which we have so much intercourse and from which we derive our origin we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, ackowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. In the war between these new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

The late events in Spain and Portugal show that Europe is still unsettled. Of this important fact no stronger proof can be adduced than that the allied powers should have thought it proper, on any principle satisfactory to themselves, to have interposed by force in the internal concerns of Spain. To what extent such interposition may be carried, on the same principle, is a question in which all independent powers whose governments differ from theirs are interested, even those most remote, and surely none more so than the United States. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference. If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new governments, and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that she can never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves in the hope that other powers will pursue the same course. (Pars. 48 and 49, message of December 2, 1823.)

President Monroe's annual message, December 2, 1823, American State Papers, Foreign Relations, volumes 246, 250.

See President Monroe to Jefferson, December 1823, Fifteenth Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, January 1902, 411–412; Eighth American Historical Review (October 1902), 50. In this letter President Monroe said: "There is some danger that the British Government, when it sees the part we have taken, may endeavor to throw the whole burden on us and profit, in case of such interposition of the allied powers of her neutrality, at our expense. But I think this would be impossible after what has passed on the subject; besides, it does not follow from what has been said that we should be bound to engage in the war in such event. Of this intimations may be given, should it be necessary. A messenger will depart for England with despatches for Mr. Rush in a few days, who will go on to St. Petersburg with others to Mr. Middleton. And, considering the crisis, it has occurred that a special mission, of the first consideration from the country, directed to England in the first instance, with power to attend any congress that may be convened on the affairs of South America or Mexico might have the happiest effect. You shall hear from me further on this subject."

"The logical conclusion seems to be that the conception of the Monroe Doctrine and much of its phraseology came from Adams and that the share of Monroe did not extend beyond revision." (Reddaway, the Monroe Doctrine, 87.)

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for the purpose of incorporating certain matters in the RECORD at this point?

Mr. TAFT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BYRNES. In connection with the statement as to the White Book revelations by the Hitler government, and the truth or untruth of these revelations, it is pertinent to know the views of Hitler as to propaganda. I ask to read a short paragraph from Mr. Hitler's book Mein Kampf. Mr. Hitler in his book, in stating what should be the attitude of the Government in discussing war guilt, said:

It was fundamentally wrong, when discussing the subject of war guilt, to suggest that Germany could be counted as partly responsible for the outbreak of that catastrophe; the proper thing would have been to lay the burden of it without cease upon the enemy, even if this did not correspond with the true course of events, as was nevertheless the actual fact. The masses are in no position to distinguish where foreign illegality begins and our own ends.

I also ask to have included as part of my remarks the statements of Hitler on the subject of war propaganda, which appear in the unexpurgated edition of his book Mein Kampf.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

What was least understood was the first prerequisite of any propaganda activity whatever—a deliberately subjective, one-sided attitude toward every question discussed. The sins in this direction at the very beginning of the war and from the top down were such that one was really justified in doubting whether such madness could really all be ascribed to pure stupidity.

What, for instance, would people say to a poster which was meant to advertise a new soap, but which also described other soaps as "good"? They would simply shake their heads.

But the same thing is true of political advertising. It is the task of propaganda not, for instance, to assay the various causes but to emphasize exclusively the one cause it represents. It must not objectively explore any truth that favors the other side, and then present it to the masses with doctrinaire honesty, but must perpetually labor for its own truths.

It was a fundamental error to discuss guilt from the standpoint that Germany could not be made solely responsible for the outbreak of the catastrophe; the right way was to load the guilt solely upon the enemy, even if this had not corresponded to the actual situation, which in this case it really did.

* * * * * * *

But all the brilliance of presentation in the world will not lead to the success of propaganda unless one fundamental principle is always kept clearly in view. Propaganda must limit itself to saying a very little, and this little it must keep forever repeating. Perseverance, here as so often in this world, is the first and most important prerequisite for success.

In the field of propaganda we must never be guided by aesthetes or the blasé—not by the former because the expression and form of what was said would soon have drawing power only for literary tea parties instead of being suited to the masses; the latter we must anxiously shun because their own lack of emotional freshness is constantly seeking new stimulants. These people are soon fed up with anything; they want variety, and they cannot put themselves in the place of their less surfeited fellow men, or even understand their needs. They are always the first to criticize propaganda, or rather its substance, which seems to them too old-fashioned, too stale, and then again too outworn. They are always looking for something new, seeking variety, and thus are the death of any effective political mass recruiting. For as soon as organization and substance of any propaganda begin to be made for these people's needs, they lose any sort of unity, and instead are altogether dissipated.

The purpose of propaganda is not to be a constant source of interesting diversion for blasé little gentlemen, but to convince, and to convince the masses. But they are so slow moving that it is always some time before they are ready even to take notice of a thing, and only thousandfold repetition of the simplest ideas will finally stick in their minds.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement of the reasons why I voted for the Pittman amendment and intend to vote against the joint resolution extending the power of the President to make reciprocal-trade agreements.

The act of June 12, 1934, which it is proposed to extend, delegates to the President power to make foreign trade agreements increasing or decreasing the existing tariff rates by 50 percent "whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States."

This delegation is so broad that it affords no standard whatever for the new tariff rates which are to be fixed by the President. If the President happens to approve the theory of protection, the rates will be protective of American industry and agriculture. If the President happens to be a free-trader, the rates may be made for revenue only and may admit foreign products in competition with manufactured products, with agricultural products, and with the products of our mines and oil wells.

Whether or not the delegation of authority is so general that the Supreme Court will hold it to be unconstitutional may be open to question. However, it seems to me clear that a Congress bound by the Constitution should not delegate to the Executive the determination of the whole policy underlying our tariff. This is no theoretical objection. The act, as passed and as proposed to be extended, would permit a free-trade Secretary of State to destroy an American industry. The Canadian agreement reducing the tariff on lumber, the Venezuelan agreement reducing the tariff on oil, the Cuban agreement reducing the tariff on sugar, the Canadian and Mexican agreements reducing the tariff on livestock, and many others, have permitted foreign goods competing with some of our major products to be delivered in this country, pay the tariff, and still undersell the same article produced in the United States.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Surely.

Mr. BROWN. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that we have an agreement with Mexico?

Mr. TAFT. I think we have an agreement which at least applies to Mexico, permitting the introduction of Mexican livestock at a rate lower than the regular tariff duty.

Mr. BROWN. I have listened very carefully to the various hearings of the Finance Committee, and I am fairly certain there is no trade agreement with Mexico.

Mr. TAFT. It may be that the Canadian treaty, through the most-favored-nation clause, extends that privilege to Mexico. I only know that when I was in Texas I met persons who said they were actually buying Mexican cattle and taking advantage of a treaty. I have not verified the fact.

Mr. BROWN. I am certain there is no agreement with Mexico.

Mr. TAFT. Except for quotas, there would be little left of some American industries. Obviously, to the extent that the quota does not limit importation, American production is decreased, and unemployment increased.

Since there does not seem to be the slightest intention on the part of the administration to impose any standard of protection in the joint resolution, I see no choice for anyone who believes in the protection of American industry, mining, and agriculture except to vote against the measure. Since the administration refused to permit Congress to impose a standard in advance of the making of treaties, I voted for the Pittman amendment to reserve the right to approve the treaties after they are made. I listened with interest to the debate on the question whether or not the foreign trade agreements provided for by the act are treaties and therefore must be subject to Senate ratification. Without passing on that question, I voted for the Pittman amendment, because apparently it was the only possible amendment having any chance of adoption which would limit the discretion now given to the President and the Secretary of State.

I cast this vote with some reluctance, because I believe Congress should delegate to an executive body, like the Tariff Commission, power to fix the actual rates on different products after Congress itself has determined the main question as to whether the United States shall adopt the policy of free trade, or the policy of protection. The actual making of tariffs by Congress has been an unsatisfactory process, and in my opinion has produced some tariffs considerably higher than were actually necessary for protection. Congress, as a body, is almost as awkward when it comes to fixing tariff rates, as in the case of railroad rates. I believe the power to fix rates may be delegated, and that some constitutional method may be worked out by which rate reductions will be dependent on rate reductions being made by foreign countries on American exports. I hope that if the joint resolution shall fail, such a plan will be developed within the limits of the Constitution.

In accord with that idea, I am proposing an amendment to the joint resolution providing that no foreign trade agreement shall go into effect until the Tariff Commission shall have filed a statement certifying that it will not reduce the rate of duty on any article below an amount sufficient to equalize the difference between the cost of such articles in this country and abroad. The amendment further provides that after the agreement is made it shall be published, and the Tariff Commission shall hold public hearings on the specific rates proposed before making any certification. The purpose of the amendment is to provide a definite standard which the executive department must follow.

In my opinion, any delegation of authority must contain a definite statement of the protective principle. This country for years has adopted a policy of protection. It has built up a higher wage scale than exists anywhere else in the world. It has built up a higher standard of living. It is possible that, in theory, free trade would produce a higher average level of prosperity over the entire world; but certainly for the time being it would tend to level down the country with the highest standard of living. This is particularly true today, when the rest of the world is impoverished by war, a condition likely to continue for many years, even after the war shall end. It is particularly true today, when foreign currencies are constantly depreciating.

Conditions have also changed since the days when the free-trade theory was approved by many economists. According to that theory, our special ability in mass production would maintain our standard of living without a tariff. But today, when American machinery can be transferred to countries where wages are only one-third of the wages in this country, any advantage we have from quantity production very quickly evaporates.

Many Senators and others are in favor of free trade in theory, but whenever they run up against an actual case of foreign competition with the products of their own State they immediately demand protection. It at once becomes clear to them that regardless of theory, the wages paid in this country and the other costs are so much higher than foreign wages and costs in many industries that the American product simply cannot successfully compete under free trade. Free trade is a theory which no party in America today can long carry out in practice. Our effort must be to hold down the tariff to the minimum which will afford adequate protection, but will not create an embargo on foreign imports.

I have heard much loose argument to the effect that the tariff is merely a subsidy for wealthy manufacturers. Of course, this is untrue. It protects the products of our mines, our forests, and our farms. It protects the American wage level and the American standard of living. The American livestock industry, for instance, would be almost destroyed if Argentine meat were freely admitted to this country. Of course, the tariff tends to raise the price of American products, but the greater part of that increase is absorbed in increased wages and other costs. If the Department of Justice does its job in enforcing competition—and I think it is doing that job today—there will be just as much competition behind the tariff wall as there would be if no tariff existed; and that competition will keep prices as low as they can be kept consistent with American costs of production and American wages. It is true that the prices of a limited number of farm products cannot benefit from a tariff because they depend on a surplus production to be sold on world markets, where they must take the world price. For the limited number of products of this class, export subsidies or other devices should serve the purpose of a tariff if properly worked out.

In my opinion, therefore, Congress must declare the policy of the United States to be one of protecting American producers. The amendment which I have offered is intended to lay down a reasonable standard of protection, which I believe should be adopted if any further extension of the reciprocal trade treaty policy is to be granted.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I intend to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], which is similar to a resolution I introduced a year ago on the same subject. It is not my intention to detain the Senate with a long speech on this subject, as I stated my position and the reasons therefor in the Senate last week.

I believe that when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was first considered in Congress it was the understanding and intention that import excise taxes should not be disturbed. I think Congress intended—certainly Congress should have intended—to keep in its own hands control of the excise taxes.

I am making a plea to my colleagues today to support the McCarran amendment in the interest of the independent oil producers of Kansas and other Western States and in the interest of the consumers of the Nation. The consumers' protection against monopoly in the petroleum industry is the independent producer. His ability to stay in business is seriously jeopardized by imports of petroleum from Venezuela. Congress finally realized the necessity of protection for the petroleum industry in 1932 by providing an excise tax on imports.

Whatever may have been the intention of Congress, last December a trade agreement was negotiated with Venezuela by which the protection afforded the independent producers was cut in half.

This reduction threatens the stability of the petroleum industry in the midcontinent and west-coast fields. It is a very serious threat to independent producers in those fields. The reduction does not help Venezuela or Venezuelans, but it does improve the opportunities for three large American oil companies operating from Venezuela to work toward monopolistic control of the Atlantic seaboard territory, squeeze the independents out of this trade territory, and then apply the squeeze over the rest of the Nation.

I desire to read to the Senate the following statements in a letter to me from Russell B. Brown, representing the Independent Petroleum Association of America.

Since the inclusion of the petroleum excise taxes in trade agreements is being discussed in the Senate, I feel you are entitled to know the position of the domestic petroleum industry.

Mr. Brown writes me.

Congress adopted these taxes by a nonpartisan vote, based on economic and not political conditions. The independent oil men do not wish to be drawn into any political dispute, but the impending consequences of greatly increased imports resulting from the reduction in these excise taxes through the Venezuelan trade agreement are so serious that they feel compelled to present their situation to you. They are doing this because Congress is the only place left for such a presentation. They have previously tried to present their case to the State Department. They have appealed to the President. Their problem has nowhere received the consideration necessary to correct the injury they have suffered through the Venezuelan trade agreement.

Since the original adoption of the excise taxes Congress has exercised a biennial supervision over them to observe their effect in protecting the domestic petroleum industry from demoralization, in preventing the occurrence of an oil monopoly, in maintaining and promoting exploratory work and development work which adds to the Nation's oil reserves, in encouraging competition, and in protecting the interests of the consumer. This biennial supervision appears to be destroyed through the inclusion of these taxes in a trade agreement.

Again I express the hope, Mr. President, that the McCarran amendment will be adopted and that the power to deal with the excise taxes on imports of petroleum, coal, copper, and lumber will be retained in the hands of Congress.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in the books may be found many definitions of reciprocity. In the 150 years of our national life there have been many efforts to give effect to reciprocity. The fisheries, shipping, trade arrangements, and practices, and, in particular, customs duties, have come within the scope of the principle as it has from time to time been understood and sought to be applied. One could quote almost interminably the writings and the utterances of our public men and of students not in public life upon this subject. I can see, however, no present advantage in so doing. I think I am justified in broadly asserting that Republicans have generally been the advocates of reciprocal proposals and that Democrats have opposed the particular efforts made in behalf thereof. It is important, however, to make it clear that no responsible Republican ever heretofore advocated reciprocity as now conceived and as now the subject of discussion, and that no Democrat before this hour ever defended such surrender of congressional control of the taxing power, such effort by the Senate to yield its rights and evade and avoid its constitutional obligations as an essential party to treaty making, or such a concentration of economic and political power in the hands of the Executive as inhere in the pending legislation.

Mr. President, I desire to place before the Senate and to make known to the people of the State of Maine the foremost reasons which compel me to vote against this legislation. So far as possible, I propose to avoid argumentative speech and to limit myself to a statement almost in summary form of the views I hold.

First of all, I conceive this legislation to be an attempt to delegate authority to the President in disregard of constitutional inhibition. Able lawyers in this body in their speeches of recent days have confirmed me in this opinion. That there are agreements not of the dignity of treaties I concede. That these may be entered into without Senate ratification I acknowledge. The President's authority to negotiate and conclude such arrangements is found in the Constitution and in the nature of the Presidential office. Legislation by the Congress is not needed to confer upon him the power to make agreements of this kind with foreign nations, and it is equally certain that legislation cannot confer upon him the power to make agreements which are treaties. Neither the Senate nor the Congress can give to the President the right to do alone that which the Constitution says can only be done by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I doubt if these general propositions will be challenged. The question, then, is in what class do these agreements of which we speak properly fall? To my mind, the overwhelming weight of authority and of reason declare them to be treaties. To my mind each and every one heretofore negotiated is violative of the Constitution, and each and every one hereafter negotiated will be evidence of further disregard of our fundamental law and of the rights of the Senate of the United States. Constitutional principles and democratic principles are both flouted in order that practical ends, as they are called, may be speedily attained.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago that if these arrangements are not treaties, the President needed no legislative act to authorize their negotiation. He had that power. Why, then, were we asked to pass the 1934 act? There can be but one answer. Clearly it was because the President wanted to negotiate and conclude arrangements with foreign nations which he did not otherwise have the power to consummate. He wanted to make what were in their substance treaties without the necessity of securing Senate advice and consent evidenced by the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate. And it is equally certain that the Congress sought to confer the right in order to free him from this Senate check upon his unrestrained discretion and act. This request for authority and this congressional action demonstrate to me at least that the President asked, and that the Congress sought to give to the President alone, a treaty-making power lodged by the Constitution in the President and the Senate.

I still insist the Constitution may not be altered in such a way.

Mr. President, I pass over other phases of the question as to the powers which Congress can delegate. My views coincide closely with those of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I wish to address myself briefly to the proposition that, even were the 1934 Trade Agreements Act a lawful grant of power, the act itself has been misinterpreted in one important particular by those charged with its administration.

The act in question, for certain general purposes, gives to the President "whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified," authority from time to time—

First. To enter into foreign-trade agreements.

Second. To proclaim modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, and so forth, as are required or are appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement which the President has entered into hereunder.

The act further provides that no proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists.

Now, Mr. President, I assert as incontrovertible that the President may negotiate a trade agreement under this act only when two situations exist. He may act only if and when he has found that an existing duty or other existing import restriction unduly burdens and restricts the foreign trade of the United States, and if and when he has found that his action will promote the general purposes declared by section 350 (a).

This language, and the whole spirit of the act, make clear that Presidential intervention is justified only if existing duties or other import restrictions are burdening our foreign trade. The provision of the act prohibiting the transfer of any article from the free list to the dutiable list but further emphasizes the stubborn fact that the theory underlying this legislation was and is that existing duties may unduly burden our commerce, and that when they do they may be lessened in their weight by the permitted reduction. But when was it ever before asserted by those on the majority side that free entry of an article unduly burdened our foreign trade?

When was it ever before urged that an existing duty or import restriction burdened the foreign trade of this country when in fact there was no duty at all and no restriction at all upon the commodity dealt with? If it be now asserted that the free entry of an article does constitute a restriction burdening our foreign trade, what can be the justification for permitting the President to bind that free entry for a term of years, thus perpetuating the alleged restriction and burden?

The act proposed to be extended gives the President jurisdiction over an article only when a duty or a restriction upon its movement burdens the trade of this country. There is no such duty and there is no such restriction when the article enters this country free of duty. There can, therefore, be no Presidential jurisdiction over it. The basic conception of this legislation is that a duty may be burdensome and restrictive, and that in such case and upon such a finding the President may afford relief through a negotiated treaty. To find that free entry constitutes such a burden as to give the President jurisdiction, and then to bind this article so burdening our trade upon the free list, is a contradiction and an absurdity.

Mr. President, it was never believed that the presence of an article on the free list, with no quota or other limitation upon its unrestricted flow, would be held to be a restrictive burden upon our foreign trade. Other charges have been leveled at the presence of a particular commodity upon the free list, but this contention is new to our political thought.

I contend that the President cannot, with proper regard for the act and for fact, assume jurisdiction over the free list and bind thereon hundreds of articles and things. The Canadian treaty alone has bound upon the free list some 22 or 23 commodities now imported into this country in intensified competition with the products of my own State. I assert this to be wholly unwarranted by the legislation before us.

Considerations other than those of a legal nature impel me to oppose this legislation. I am against placing in the control of a single man such power as the act gives to affect for good or ill the economic, the agricultural, the industrial, and the social life of our people.

This legislation as it is interpreted gives to the President power to favor one section of our country to the prejudice of another; to build one industry upon the ruins of another; to profit one class of workers at the loss of another class; to sacrifice industry to agriculture, or to advance the cause of industry at the cost of agriculture. I am against the lodgment of such powers in any one man.

I oppose this legislation further because I believe it to be part of a general assault upon the protective system, an assault which has already done harm to agriculture and particular branches of industry, and which, if persisted in and pressed to the point to which its advocates would extend it, must do untold injury to American agriculture and industry and must level down American standards of wage and life to those of other nations. I have seen life in too many countries of the world to welcome such results for America. Already over a thousand tariff rates have been lowered. Unless this tendency is checked, we shall soon be upon the lowest tariff basis in at least a half century. I am not ready to contribute to this disaster.

In particular, I shall vote against this joint resolution because of the impact of the treaties negotiated thereunder upon the State of Maine, its interests, and its people. In greater degree than any other State, Maine is surrounded by Canada. Almost every product of the farm, the forests, and the waters of my State is likewise produced by the farm, the forests, and the waters of Canada. Hardly a concession could be made to the products of eastern Canada except at the cost of a product of Maine. By the Canadian treaty the duties were reduced upon butter and eggs, cheese, milk, cream, apples, potatoes, livestock and hay, upon lumber and timber, upon pulp and pulpwood, upon fish found in our coastal waters and the products thereof, and upon many other articles and things produced in Maine, or these products were frozen upon the free list beyond the reach of remedial efforts. I venture the assertion that a larger percentage of the products of my State has been adversely affected by the exercise of this tariff-making power than in the case of any other State. The knowledge that they have been offered up as a vicarious sacrifice to the interests of some other part of the United States, that some other industry elsewhere may be benefited by their new hardships, neither clothes nor feeds nor houses the people of Maine.

I should do violence to my convictions that this legislation is unconstitutional; that it confers dangerous powers upon a single man; that it threatens the well-being of our country; and particularly that it prejudices the interests and people of my own State, and that the exercise of the powers claimed to be conferred is more liable to lead to international discord than to international understanding and peace, if I did not by my voice and vote register my disapproval of the pending measure.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WHITE. I do.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have listened with great admiration to the illuminating address of the Senator from Maine. His allusion to the fixing on the free list of a large number of items which interest the State of Maine and which also interest the State of Vermont moves me to ask him a question which I think is the test of the soundness of the act. To reduce the matter to the most absurd form, assume that there is only one item which is fixed on the free list for the period of 3 years and 6 months, the duration of the agreement; what has been done to the legislative power of Congress during that period of 3 years and 6 months?

Mr. WHITE. Of course, in the case stated by the Senator from Vermont, Congress has been deprived of the power to deal with that article, and if these arrangements have validity and are constitutional, we have entered into a solemn covenant with another nation that we will not touch that article during the life of the agreement.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. When I asked the Senator from Missouri to yield I did not observe the presence of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, who has charge of the joint resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Several Senators will be necessarily absent this afternoon, or within a few moments. It is apparent to everyone that it will be at least 5 o'clock, or nearly that hour, before we can reach a vote on the pending amendment. It would greatly inconvenience at least two Senators for debate to be prolonged that long, with a vote at that time. I therefore ask unanimous consent that on the pending amendment or any substitute for it, beginning immediately after the approval of the Journal tomorrow, debate be limited to 10 minutes for any individual Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that when the Senate reconvenes tomorrow debate on the pending amendment or any substitute therefor be limited to 10 minutes for each Senator. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. I think that is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, just a minute, please. As I understand, a 10-minute limitation is asked for on this amendment or any other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; merely on the pending amendment, or any substitute for it.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for no limitation on debate on the joint resolution generally, or on any other amendment, but merely for a 10-minute limitation upon debate by any individual Senator on this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. We had better have the author of the amendment present before any agreement on the subject is made. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	Lee	Schwellenbach
Ashurst	Downey	Lodge	Sheppard
Austin	Ellender	Lucas	Shipstead
Bailey	Frazier	Lundeen	Smathers

Davis	La Follette	Schwartz

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to the roll call, a quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri has the floor, and he has yielded to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I again make the request, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is in the Chamber now, that after 12 o'clock tomorrow no individual Senator may speak longer than 10 minutes on the pending amendment, or any amendment thereto, or substitute therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I respectfully suggest that we compromise the matter by making the limitation 20 minutes on the amendment or any substitute therefor. I think the Senator from Mississippi will probably be agreeably surprised at the shortness of the debate.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we can get through very quickly. May I suggest a compromise of 15 minutes?

Mr. McCARRAN. I prefer my compromise.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree to the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator mean by his request that during the further consideration of the pending amendment debate shall be limited to 20 minutes on the amendment and on the joint resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I saw that there would be very violent objection to that.

Mr. McNARY. I stated that I would object to any limitation of debate on the joint resolution——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I have stated that I would object to any limitation of debate on the joint resolution or any other amendment save the one under consideration at this time.

Mr. McCARRAN. My understanding is that the request is as to the pending amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. That commencing tomorrow at 12 o'clock no Senator may speak longer than 20 minutes on the pending amendment or any substitute therefor. Is that the understanding?

Mr. HARRISON. I had hoped to make the time 15 minutes, but I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi modifies his request. Is there objection to the request as modified? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, before I begin the brief remarks which I wish to make directly to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], I desire to make a few remarks which it had been my hope to make on Friday last before the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] was voted upon.

The contention advanced in the debate on the amendment of the senior Senator from Nevada that under the Constitution of the United States ratification by two-thirds of the Senate of the United States was necessary for the validity of the trade agreements, in other words, argument to the effect that the trade agreements were in fact treaties and as such must necessarily, under the Constitution, be considered as treaties and accordingly submitted to the Senate for ratification, was so completely answered and so devastatingly dealt with by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] that I would not presume to retrace in any degree whatever the arguments which were made by the Senator from Georgia in his masterly address. In my opinion, no man who ever sat in this body has had a clearer legal mind and more lucid power of expression on legal and constitutional questions than the Senator from Georgia, and it seems to me that in that respect his argument upon the pending measure was and will remain unanswerable.

Not by way of enlarging upon the argument of the Senator from Georgia, but merely to add another set of records which the Senator from Georgia did not have the opportunity to consider, I desire to call attention to certain facts with regard to the trade agreements provided for in section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897, generally known as the Dingley Act.

A great deal of emphasis was placed by the senior Senator from Nevada on his allegation that the agreements concluded under section 3 of the act of 1897 were merely temporary modi vivendi, which could be terminated at any time by either party to such an agreement. On the other hand, he stated, the agreements under the present Trade Agreements Act are treaties, since they run for periods of 3 years.

Mr. President, first it is important to note that the Trade Agreements Act is in fact definitely more restrictive with respect to the duration of agreements than was section 3 of the Dingley Act, which made no provision whatever and contained no limitation whatever with respect to the duration of the agreements therein authorized. On the other hand, and in direct contrast, the present Trade Agreements Act, the extension of which is the question now pending before the Senate, limits the maximum original term of any agreement to 3 years, but it does not require or contemplate that these agreements shall necessarily be for terms of 3 years. Moreover, after the maximum initial period of the trade agreements of 3 years, the agreements are terminable under the terms of the act on not more than 6 months' notice. This further limitation was not in the act of 1897. In fact, as is shown by the table which I propose to append to these remarks, a substantial number of the trade agreements made under the present act were made for initial periods of less than the maximum period of 3 years. Several of them, in fact, were originally terminable upon 6 months' notice.

The table also shows that as of today some 15 agreements out of the 20 agreements still in effect are now terminable upon not more than 6 months' notice, since their original terms have now expired.

The appended memorandum summarizing the terms of the 15 agreements concluded under section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 shows that at least two of the agreements were for longer terms than those permitted by the present Trade Agreements Act. The agreement with Portugal under the Dingley Act was for a term of 5 years, and thereafter was only terminable after 1 year's notice. The agreement with Italy was for a period of approximately 3½ years, and thereafter was terminable upon not less than 1 year's notice.

In the case of several agreements the term was indefinite, for example, the French agreement, which was signed on May 28, 1898, and which was apparently terminated only by the Tariff Act of 1909, 11 years later. It may be noted in this connection that there was quite a diplomatic dispute with France with respect to our right to terminate an agreement within an indefinite term. These indefinite agreements were thus much less limited than in the case of the trade agreements entered into under the present law, which are for specified short terms. It may further be noted that many of these agreements were embraced in formal documents, and not consummated by a mere exchange of notes.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I have been somewhat disturbed in regard to the question of termination to which the Senator from Missouri is now addressing himself. Does the Senator think there is any authority left in the Congress itself to terminate a trade agreement, or is that authority entirely in the executive department of the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator I think the agreements could be terminated by act of Congress.

Mr. BROWN. By what method could Congress terminate an agreement? The repeal of the law would not operate to that effect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I assume it would require an affirmative act of Congress directing the President to terminate the notice, which would, in my opinion, be within the jurisdiction of Congress. Of course, it would require the signature of the President.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator recognizes that against an unwilling Executive it would mean that a two-thirds vote of the Senate and of the House would be required to bring about termination of the agreement?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is unquestionably true, as it is true in regard to every other law upon the statute books. The same argument was made in regard to the reorganization bill, and the same argument is made and is applicable to every other grant of power to the President of the United States.

Mr. BROWN. Looking at the other side of the controversy, because I am not partisan with respect to this matter at all, it seems to me that we are going quite far when we say to the Executive, "You can tie up this matter for any length of time you desire." The treaties are for 3 years—"agreements" is a better word—the agreements are for 3 years, and for a period thereafter until the President gives 6 months' notice of termination.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the point to which I was addressing myself was a comparison of the powers granted under the Trade Agreements Act and under the act of 1897, in response to what was said in the debate last week by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and I was pointing out that the powers as to duration of time—the powers under the act of 1897 were much more extensive than under this act, and in one case which I cited, the agreement with France, was absolutely indefinite as to time, and was only terminated in fact by the passage of an act by Congress, to with the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act.

Mr. BROWN. The other feature to which I should like the Senator to put his mind is this——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I shall be glad to put my mind to things which may interest the Senator from Michigan when I shall have concluded the matter concerning which I am trying to address to the Senate. I shall be glad to discuss that question or any other question at that time, but I should like to continue my statement, and then take up what the Senator has in mind a little later.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may place something in the RECORD in answer to the first question asked by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Washington for that purpose.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I recall to the memory of the Senator from Michigan the citation which I placed in the RECORD last Friday, the case of Van Der Weyde v. Ocean Transport Co., Ltd., et al. (297 U. S. 114), in which the precise question of the direction by Congress to the President either to abrogate or to modify a treaty was made in section 16 of the Seamen's Act of March 4, 1915, and in this opinion, which was written by Chief Justice Hughes, the Supreme Court said:

> As to the third point, we think that the question as to the authority of the Executive in the absence of congressional action, or of action by the treaty-making power, to denounce a treaty of the United States is not here involved. In this instance the Congress requested and directed the President to give notice of the termination of the treaty provisions in conflict with the act. From every point of view, it was incumbent upon the President, charged with the conduct of negotiations with foreign governments and also with the duty to take care that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed, to reach a conclusion as to the inconsistency between the provisions of the treaty and the provisions of the new law.

In other words, the Supreme Court very definitely said that when the Congress authorized and directed the President to take a certain action in reference to treaties which were in effect there was a responsibility upon the President, since he did have imposed on him the duty to take care that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed, to carry out that direction of the Congress, and to reserve, modify, or to abrogate a treaty as Congress directed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in regard to the other question of the Senator from Michigan, I hope the Senator from Michigan did not think I had the slightest intention of being discourteous when I suggested that I should like to continue with my remarks.

Mr. BROWN. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree with the Senator from Michigan, of course, that so far as changing this situation by an act of Congress is concerned, it would necessarily, in case of veto by the President, take a two-thirds vote of each branch of the Congress to effectuate such a change. That would be equally true, however, if the agreements were considered as treaties and ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. That situation would not in the slightest degree be affected by the question of whether these instruments are agreements or treaties.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, it has geen generally conceded here that Congress may by an act abrogate a treaty which has been ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. Inasmuch as these agreements do not rise to the dignity of a treaty, of course, we should be bound to concede that the same sort of action would affect one of these agreements that would affect a treaty which had been ratified by two-thirds vote.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. That is one point that deeply concerns me. Does the Senator from Missouri agree with the Senator from Kentucky that by a concurrent resolution the Senate and the House could abrogate a trade agreement?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that. He said an act of Congress, which could not be a concurrent resolution. It would require either a joint resolution or a bill, which would have to be signed by the President.

Mr. BROWN. That comes back to the point that against an unwilling Executive, an Executive who had vetoed the bill or joint resolution, it would take a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate to abrogate the measure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And that would be true as to any law that Congress desired to repeal, if the President vetoed it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true with regard to the provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act or any other law. Under the provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act, Congress granted the President authority to raise or lower rates 50 percent. As against an unwilling Executive, that could be changed only by an act of Congress by a two-thirds vote of each body. So, it seems to me, the situation would be precisely the same.

Mr. BROWN. No; I think there is a difference. In the case of the Smoot-Hawley Act or any other legislation, we enact the legislation. We determine what the rates are. In this case, we pass on to the President the right to enter into trade agreements. We do not know what they are going to be; we do not know what their contents will be; we do not know what the rates will be. If we are entirely dissatisfied with the rates, as we may be, we put ourselves in such a position that it would take two-thirds of the Senate and the House to abrogate the agreement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, Congress passed an act giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to fix railroad rates. If the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes some railroad rates that Congress does not like, what can Congress do about it? Congress cannot do anything except to pass an act either exercising its legislative functions of changing those rates or ending the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates; and if the President of the United States does not like that act of Congress, and sees fit to veto it, the same situation exists; that is, it takes two-thirds of each House to override the veto.

Mr. BROWN. The cases are not parallel at all. In the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, we grant it certain authority to fix rates. It is not a body that has the power to veto an act of Congress. The President of the United States has that right. But in the case of the trade agreements we are granting authority to the President, who happens to be the governmental official who has the power of veto, which does not exist in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that is a distinction of fact without any distinction of law, if I may be pardoned for saying so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. A while ago the Senator from Michigan stated that in the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act the rates were fixed, or that in a resolution we might pass we could fix the rates, whereas in this particular resolution the rates are not fixed. I think they must be considered as having been already fixed by law. They are in the Smoot-Hawley Act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just as much so as in the case of the provisions of the flexible-tariff measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; just as we set out in the act of 1934 what the rates would be, but authorized the President to modify them 50 percent up or down by trade agreements. Under the Hawley-Smoot Act and previous acts the President, on the advice and recommendation of the Tariff Commission, could raise or lower the rates within the limitation of 50 percent. So I think, for all intents and purposes, we may consider that the present law is based on the acknowledged fact that the rates have already been fixed by Congress, and they are just as effective as if they were carried in this law, and the President is authorized to change them by 50 percent, up or down, and no more. So we really do not get away from the situation fixed in the act in which the Tariff Commission was established and in which the President was authorized to fix the rates.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in my remarks a table showing the trade agreements in force as of March 1, 1940, the country with which the agreement has been made, the date signed, the date effective, the initial term of duration, and the date at which the agreement may be terminated by 6 months' notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I also ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point, as part of my remarks, a table giving the summary of the 15 executive agreements concluded under section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897, in connection with which I direct particular attention to the agreements with Portugal, Italy, and France, as I mentioned a moment ago; also, a summary of the 12 executive agreements entered into under section 3 of the McKinley Tariff Act of 1890, which conveyed similar powers and in which the result of the statute was similar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FIFTEEN EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS CONCLUDED UNDER SECTION 3 OF THE DINGLEY TARIFF ACT OF 1897 (30 STAT. 151, 203)

I. NOTE

The texts of all but two of these agreements appear in Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols, and Agreements Between the United States and Other Powers at the pages cited hereafter. The references to the texts of the other two agreements are given in the list of agreements which appears under part III. Except where noted under part III, the agreements were in the form of a formal international document reciting the authority of the signatories and, in most cases, the purposes of the agreement, as well as the particular concessions granted. In each case, of course, the concessions granted by the United States were limited to those authorized by section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897. Consequently, in the summary of the agreements contained in part III, the concessions granted by the United States have, in most cases, not been specified.

II. SUMMARY OF SECTION 3 OF THE DINGLEY TARIFF ACT OF 1897

"That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies, producing and exporting to this country the following articles: Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies, or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials; champagne and all other sparkling wines; still wines, and vermouth; paintings and statuary; or any of them, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, as soon as may be after the passage of this act and from time to time thereafter, to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufacturers of the United States; and whenever the government of any country, or colony, producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States, or make concessions in favor of the products, or manufactures thereof, which, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend, during the time of such agreement or concession, by proclamation to that effect, the imposition and collection of the duties mentioned in this act, on such article or articles so exported to the United States from such country or colony, and thereupon and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such article or articles shall be as follows, namely:"

Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude: 5 percent ad valorem.

Brandies, or other manufactured or distilled spirits: $1.75 per proof gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines: In bottles containing from 1 pint to 1 quart, $6 per dozen; in bottles containing from one-half pint to 1 pint, $3 per dozen; in bottles containing one-half pint or less, $1.50 per dozen; in bottles or vessels containing more than 1 quart, in addition to $6 per dozen bottles, on the quantities in excess of 1 quart at the rate of $1.90 per gallon.

Still wines and vermouth: In casks, 35 cents per gallon; in bottles or jugs, per case of 1 dozen each containing from 1 pint to 1 quart, or 24 bottles or jugs containing not more than 1 pint, $1.25 per case; and any excess beyond these quantities found in such bottles or jugs, 4 cents per pint or fractional part thereof.

Paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen-and-ink drawings, and statuary: 15 percent ad valorem.

"The President shall have power, and it shall be his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that any such agreement in the section mentioned is not being fully executed by the government with which it shall have been made, to revoke such suspension and notify such government thereof.

"And it is further provided that with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country, or any colony of such government, producing and exporting directly or indirectly to the United States coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States, which, in view of the introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans into the United States as in this act hereinbefore provided for, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend by proclamation to that effect the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, of the products of such country or colony, for such time as he shall deem just; and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, the products or exports, direct or indirect, from such designated country, as follows:

"On coffee, 3 cents per pound.

"On tea, 10 cents per pound.

"On tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, 50 cents per pound; vanilla beans, $2 per pound; vanilla beans, commercially known as cuts, $1 per pound."

Date of signature: April 22, 1907.

Date of proclamation under section 3: May 2, 1907.

Scope of agreement: In addition to granting the concessions authorized by section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897, the United States agreed to make certain modifications in its customs and consular regulations, as described in a note from Secretary Root to the German Ambassador dated April 22, 1907, and attached to the agreement. Germany agreed to apply specified tariff rates to a long list of American export products which are set forth in seven and one-half pages of small print in a schedule attached to the agreement.

Duration of agreement: To remain in force until June 30, 1908, and thereafter to be terminable upon 6 months' notice.

Text of agreement appears in: 1 Malloy 563.

Netherlands

Date of signature: May 16, 1907.

Date of proclamation under section 3: August 12, 1908 (35 Stat. 2198).

Scope of agreement: Maximum Netherlands duties are specified for mutton, salt pork, salt bacon, and canned meats in packages of more than 4 pounds. The United States, in addition to concessions authorized by section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897, agreed to amend its instructions to customs officers.

Duration of agreement: Indefinite, but terminable upon 1 year's notice with the exception that the United States may terminate upon 3 months' notice in the event that the Netherlands failed to give most-favored-nation treatment to any United States product.

Text of agreement appears in: 2 Malloy 1275.

Great Britain

Date of signature: November 19, 1907.

Date of proclamation under section 3: December 5, 1907 (35 Stat. 2163).

Scope of concessions received: Samples of dutiable goods brought into the United Kingdom by American commercial travelers to be exempt from inspection on importation on the basis of certification of the American customs authorities at the time of exportation.

Duration of agreement: To continue in force until after 6 months' notice of termination.

Text of agreement appears in: 1 Malloy 813.

France—Supplementary agreement

Date of signature: January 28, 1908.

Date of proclamation under section 3: January 28, 1908 (35 Stat. 2178).

Scope of agreement: Food products of the United States and Puerto Rico except sugar and mineral oils of the United States to be admitted into France and Algeria at the French minimum tariff rates. The United States agreed to impose the reduced duties authorized by section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897 on champagne and sparkling wines imported into the United States and Puerto Rico. In addition, each party agreed to appoint a commission of three experts to consider complaints with respect to the import regulations of the respective countries. Each commission was to report to its own government, which report was to form the basis of an exchange of views designed to remove, if possible, the causes of complaint considered in the report.

Duration of agreement: To remain in force during the life of the agreements of May 28, 1898, and August 20, 1902.

Text of agreement appears in: 1 Malloy 547.

Spain—Supplementary agreement in the form of an exchange of notes

Date of signature: February 20, 1909.

Date of proclamation under section 3: February 20, 1909 (35 Stat. 2229).

Scope of agreement: The notes recite that in order to remove any possible ground for the exercise by the Government of Spain of its right under the agreement of August 1, 1906, to rescind any of its concessions made to the United States, the President of the United States deems the concessions made by Spain as reciprocal and equivalent to the reduced duties authorized by section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897. Accordingly, the note of the United States stated that the President would issue a proclamation suspending the duties on sparkling wines imported from Spain and would substitute therefor the reduced duties authorized by section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897.

Duration of agreement: No period specified. Presumably as this was supplementary to the agreement of August 1, 1906, the supplementary agreement was to continue for the life of the earlier agreement.

Text of agreement appears in: 2 Malloy 1721.

Italy—Supplementary agreement

Date of signature: March 2, 1909.

Date of proclamation under section 3: April 24, 1909 (36 Stat. 2492).

Scope of concessions received: Italy agreed to a specific maximum rate of duty on mowers and tedders imported from the United States.

Duration of agreement: To continue in effect until after 1 year's notice of termination.

Text of agreement appears in: 1 Malloy 994.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In connection with the suggestion made on the floor, the fact that the trade agreements tied the hands of Congress with respect to future action on matters covered in the agreements, although the answer was given that this is merely action taken pursuant to the authorization and policy which the present Congress deems desirable and necessary to effectuate its purpose, the further point can be made that, of course, if Senate ratification was required and the agreements were treaties this would be equally true, and, in fact, it is probable that if treaties were concluded they would not be for such short periods, since the President in negotiating the treaties would not be limited by the restrictions with respect to the duration laid down by the Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate for only a little while on the pending amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. It seems to me this amendment may be repeated without undue loss of time of the Senate, in order that we may all clearly understand the issue presented by the amendment.

On page 1, line 8, after the numerals "1940", it is proposed to insert a comma and the following:

with the proviso that the authority conferred in the said act does not embrace authority to include in any trade-agreement negotiations excise taxes imposed under the provisions of paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (c) of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, which are now a part of the Internal Revenue Code, subtitle (c), chapter 29, subchapter (b), part 1, sections 3420, 3422, 3423, 3424, 3425.

Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator from Nevada in drafting his amendment took the trouble to refer to the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, giving the subsections thereof, because that very designation conclusively shows the nature of the sections to which he refers, and shows that while the duties are referred to here as excise duties, they are in fact import duties, and have been so treated by the Congress of the United States in codifying the revenue law.

I call attention to the fact that in the codification these sections do not appear under the heading of excise taxes, which are internal revenue taxes and have always been so considered in the revenue history of this country until this fake device was brought forward in the consideration and passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act; but they are included under the section devoted to import taxes. They are import taxes, Mr. President, as recognized by the codification of the laws unanimously passed by the Congress. They are import duties as recognized by the courts of the United States. They are import duties, as is fully set out in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, based upon court decisions and upon the codification of the law. So why should we not stop talking about excise duties and call them what they are? They are tariff duties, levied under the very terms of the act itself, in accordance with the practices, rules, and methods of collection with respect to every other tariff duty on articles coming into the United States.

Mr. President, I have heard the story that at one of President Lincoln's Cabinet meetings he turned to Secretary Seward, who was reported not to have been a great admirer of Lincoln's propensity for joking, and asked Seward, "If you were to call a sheep's tail a leg, how many legs would the sheep have?" Seward simply snorted and said, "Why, five, of course." Lincoln said, "Oh, no; it would not. It would have only four, because calling a sheep's tail a leg would not make it one." [Laughter.]

Calling these import duties excise taxes will not change the nature of the taxes. They are import duties—tariff levies—and ought to be considered as such.

We come down to the naked question whether or not there is anything in the peculiar situation of the commodities covered in these four sections, namely, petroleum, coal, lumber, and copper, which entitles them to be specially selected and set aside as a sacrosanct institution to which the provisions of the act should not be applicable. Except for the fact that the States which produce the commodities or are interested in the particular taxes have a very large representation in this body—more or less disproportionate to the population of those States—there is no reason on the face of the earth, Mr. President, why these duties should not stand on their own feet, the same as other duties contained in the various tariff acts of the United States which are the subject of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

I do not say that the duty on copper ought to be reduced. I do not say that the duty on petroleum, lumber, or coal ought to be reduced. What I do say is that there is nothing sacred about those commodities which justifies the Congress of the United States in setting them aside and saying, "All the other hundreds of thousands of items contained in a tariff bill may be the subject of reciprocal-trade agreements, but you shall not lay your finger on these particular items because they are the Ark of the Covenant. They are sacred."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that there are many articles of importation into the United States with respect to which the proportion of imports to domestic production is much greater than in the case of oil, petroleum, copper, or lumber?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that is unquestionably true. I know that certain Senators are very much interested in the production of flaxseed in this country. Why should they not say, "We want an excise duty, or a prohibitive tariff duty—which is what it amounts to—on flaxseed? You have established such a duty on copper, oil, coal, and lumber. Why should flaxseed be left out?"

Others might say, "We are interested in zinc, and we want a prohibitive tariff on zinc. Why should copper from Arizona and Montana have a prohibitive tariff, while zinc from Missouri and Oklahoma has not? Why should one be subject to the operation of this general law and the other not be?"

Many people in various sections of the country are interested in wheat. Others are interested in cotton. There are still some people interested in cotton in this country. Others are interested in countless other commodities; but the Congress of the United States is solemnly asked to pick out four separate tariff items—because that is what they are—and say, "These are sacred, and nothing must be done with them."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's thought, but his argument as to cotton reminds me of the fact that ever since I have been in the Senate, western Senators—and I am very happy to say that I have been one of them—have supported a subsidy for cotton, and have stood for the protection of cotton. I am now looking to my brethren from cotton-producing States to support copper so that we may keep on the employment rolls American citizens who constitute the red blood of this country, just as we have tried to protect the industry of the cotton-producing States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, by and large the representatives of every other commodity in this country have participated in the formulation of the program which has been in effect since the inauguration of President Roosevelt in 1933; but the proposal the Senator himself is advancing is that four particular commodities shall be selected out of all the thousands of commodities whose representatives have participated in the making of various policies—including the policy with regard to cotton—and that we shall say, "These are sacred, and you must not touch them."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. The statute itself sets forth one exception. The entire field of international trade is not opened by the pending measure. Subsection (b) of section 1 provides:

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the application, with respect to rates of duty established under this section pursuant to agreements with countries other than Cuba, of the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902—

That is the most important agreement of all with respect to the interests of many States of the Union—> or to preclude giving effect to an exclusive agreement with Cuba concluded under this section, modifying the existing preferential-customs treatment of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of Cuba.

That means that we can enter into an agreement with Cuba and eliminate in that agreement the most-favored-nation clause.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, the Senator is familiar with the fact that that provision goes back to an old international obligation of the United States growing out of the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BROWN. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not debating its wisdom; but it seems to me that is an essentially different question from selecting four commodities and saying, "These are sacrosanct and are to be excepted from the general operation of the Tariff Act."

Mr. BROWN. What is the effect of that clause? The effect of it is that Cuba is granted preferential treatment, not particularly with respect to Venezuela, Peru, or any other sugar-producing area, but with respect to the sugar industry of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That may be. If the Senator should move to strike out that provision, the subject would be highly debatable. I can say to the Senator—because I was a member of the Finance Committee when this provision was first reported—that it was adopted simply to carry out an obligation which was assumed by treaty by the United States after the conclusion of the Spanish-American War. However, I still insist that that is entirely beside the point of selecting four commodities and having them made sacred.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I correctly recall, the Tariff Act of 1930 and most previous tariff acts gave Cuba a preferential duty on sugar. While the duty was $2.20, I believe, from other countries, a 20-percent differential was accorded to Cuba, because ever since the Spanish-American War we have recognized a sort of moral obligation toward and sponsorship of the Republic of Cuba, which we never felt toward any other country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We assumed it by formal action in the so-called Platt amendment, and in pursuance of that policy a similar provision was incorporated in every tariff act subsequently passed.

Mr. BROWN. It was the use of the word "sacrosanct" by the Senator that brought me to my feet. So far as the products of Michigan are concerned, all four of these commodities—coal, copper, oil, and lumber—are produced in the State of Michigan. We cannot be sacrosanct as to those products, but we can be as to the products of the island of Cuba; and that is what rather disturbs me in regard to this legislation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has kindly called my attention to the provision of the Tariff Act of 1930, section 316:

> CUBAN RECIPROCITY TREATY NOT AFFECTED
> Nothing in this act shall be construed to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, or the provisions of the act of December 17, 1903, chapter 1.

So in that section of the act to which the Senator has referred the United States in the Tariff Act of 1930 was simply carrying out its treaty obligations to the Republic of Cuba.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me further, when the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, which was passed in 1930, was enacted, of course, there were set up certain standards and certain tariff rates that may have been beneficial to the State of Michigan and to the Middle West. They were fixed and established within reasonable limitations. In consideration of those rates it was all right for us to agree to this arrangement with respect to Cuba, but when we come to this legislation——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It had already been agreed to long since, I will say to the Senator, by treaty between the United States and Cuba, ratified back in 1902.

Mr. BROWN. That is true, but when we come to this agreement we fix and establish the arrangements with Cuba, and do not permit the President to interfere with those. However, when it comes to rates that are effective in my State of Michigan, we permit the President to do almost anything he wants to do with respect to those rates. So I say it is a different situation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say, too, it is a different situation. I say that the situation with regard to Cuba is a peculiar situation made necessary by the fact that the United States saw fit to enter into a treaty which has been carried out in our tariff legislation. I refer to section 320 of the Tariff Act of 1922, containing a provision, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point, exactly similar to the provision of the act of 1930. So there can be no question whatever as to the fact that we were bound by treaty obligations, and it seems to me that that situation is not in any way comparable to that of selecting particular commodities for special treatment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the section of the Tariff Act referred to by the Senator from Missouri will be printed in the RECORD.

The section referred to is as follows:

SEC. 320. That nothing in this act shall be construed to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, or the provisions of the act of December 17, 1903, chapter 1.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, much has been said here about certain so-called commitments which were made in the Senate and in the Congress in connection with the passage of the Trade Agreements Act in 1934 and again by its extension in 1937. I read part of the RECORD this morning. I think it would be beneficial to call the attention of the Senate again to precisely what happened on that subject and to the whole of it. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] toward the close of the consideration of the original act of 1934 proposed an amendment which would freeze these commodities under the duties called excise taxes. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] objected very strenuously and the Senator from Mississippi withdrew that amendment, which, in turn, was then offered by the then Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long, and overwhelmingly defeated by the Senate by a vote of 29 to 57, or nearly 2 to 1.

In that debate after the Senator from Mississippi had offered his amendment, the Senator from Arizona said:

Mr. President, I have taken no time on this bill; and we are to vote, I believe, in 10 minutes. Will not the Senator from Mississippi withdraw this statement? I do not want to be required to speak against the amendment, but there are a dozen Members on this side of the Chamber who ought to do so, and we have only 10 minutes.

Will the Senator now at the last hour draw a dirk? Will the Senator please withdraw his amendment? Is the Senator proposing—

With the frankness which always distinguishes the Senator from Arizona and charms his associates in this body on all occasions, the Senator from Arizona was candid enough to state the reason why he did not want any agreement made as to "freezing" the rates—

Is the Senator proposing to go to the country with a bill which will preclude the President from raising the tariffs on oil, copper, and lumber?

I oppose that amendment. No man who pretends to be fair would, after discussion upon this bill has been practically completed, draw from his breast a dirk against these great industries.

I have always been in favor of a proposal to give the President the power to raise tariffs and lower them, to get away from logrolling—

Which is what we are trying to do in this measure—and it ill becomes the able Senator at this hour, when no one can make reply to him, to propose such an amendment. It is conceived in iniquity, it is born in sin, and generated in unfairness.

I regret to apply this last remark of my great and distinguished friend from Arizona to the amendment pending before the Senate offered by my great and distinguished friend from Nevada, but I am compelled to do so because the proposition involved in the two amendments is precisely the same.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if I had walked into the Senate Chamber not knowing what had previously occurred, and that language had been read, I would know it was mine. I recognize my own rhetoric.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am very happy to bear witness that no Senator in this Chamber could possibly compare in rhetoric with the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I might say that I have great tenacity, but it is tempered with tremendous flexibility.

Mr. President, I think I ought not to be silent in the situation because the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is a man so able, so learned, and so pungent in argument that what he says is always worthy of consideration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not rise to disclaim or explain anything. My policy in life has been never to explain because if today one explains tomorrow he will be explaining his explanation. When this administration came into power I profoundly believed that it would be a high-tariff administration.

Possibly I had sweetbreads for brains when I so believed. Suffice it to say that I believed it, and I had reason to believe it, and I believe now that if the Roosevelt administration goes on the rocks it will be because it has not been a high-tariff administration.

Mr. President, now, as to that somewhat gorgeous rhetoric, I wish to say that the debate had practically closed on that occasion; in fact, I think each Senator was allowed but 5 minutes, and I could not, nor could any other Senator, explain in 5 minutes that which was understood by all responsible persons, to wit, that there was an agreement on all sides, including the administration, that the tariff on copper would be raised. Believing that the tariff on copper would be raised, believing that it should be raised, I could not consent to an amendment which would preclude the President from raising the tariff on copper.

I would today vote to give the President the power to raise or increase the tariff.

I am a high-tariff man and for that I make no apology. I have in season, and many of my brother Senators, think perhaps out of season, championed high tariffs. Perhaps I am trespassing too long on the time of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am delighted to have the Senator say anything he desires on my time.

Mr. ASHURST. This is not the occasion to speak, much as I should delight to do so, of the beneficent effect of high tariffs on our country. I may be old-fashioned or I may be reactionary, but I believe in high tariffs, and I have never failed in the past 20 years to advocate high tariffs. If someone advocating low tariffs should be a candidate for office in the West, in my judgment he would not be elected.

It may be asked, Why, therefore, are you so interested? The answer is if I do not stand for high tariffs, Arizona will send someone here who will have the courage to stand for high tariffs. I have an election approaching. I would be disingenuous and lacking in frankness if I should pretend that I am putting this question upon a more exalted plane. Arizona will see to it that I am displaced by a high-tariff man if I fail to do my duty here.

Now, if the Senator will pardon me for a few moments more——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I speak this afternoon with mingled feelings of duty and gratitude. It is my duty to speak for high tariffs on this floor because I am thus representing the views of my people and of the West in speaking for high tariffs.

It will be 28 years tomorrow since I was inducted into the Senate. No Senator has ever been treated more generously by his constituents than have I. Not only have they repeatedly reelected me but they have done that which few States have ever done to or for any Senator—allowed him to do almost as he pleased. For that I am profoundly grateful to Arizona. No words at my command can express to the people of Arizona the gratitude I feel to them for so long sustaining me here and almost always giving me the right to act as I thought best. Other States may have paralleled that action in generosity toward a Senator. None has ever excelled it in generosity toward a Senator.

Therefore if I fail in any way in the Senate I have no alibi. The people have given me the privilege of doing what I think proper and right, and if I fail it is my own fault. Whatever may be my shortcomings, since I became converted to the high-tariff policy I have not failed on any proper occasion to advocate high tariffs.

May I trespass for another 5 minutes on the time of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I wish to say, not as a mere gesture—I do not say this as a friendly Senatorial courtesy respecting the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]—that long before I came to the Senate I recognized him not only as an expert in parliamentary law, but as a student of treaties and of tariffs; and while the words of affection I have toward him come from my heart, they are words that one student might say about another in recognition of his ability and his diligence; but I disagree with him on the tariff. He believes in low tariffs. He has abundant historical, even party, authority for it.

Mr. President, why am I so much interested in copper tariff? Why my solicitude for copper tariffs? First, whether destiny is kind or unkind in building a State largely around a particular industry is for someone else to decide. Suffice it to say that, while Arizona has great lumbering interests, while she has great livestock and agricultural interests and possibilities, while her tourist trade is remarkably great, and her many dude ranches and her many places of majestic scenery attract persons, and while she produces all the precious, rare, and base metals, except oil and coal, she is engaged largely in the production of copper. Copper, directly or indirectly, pays about one-half of all the taxes paid in Arizona. Copper employs about one-half of all the persons employed in Arizona. I should be a poor representative of Arizona, if I did not have a solicitude and at least a friendly attitude toward the major industry of my own State.

I know how boresome and tiresome figures are; but let me, with the Senator's further kind permission, read some data about the copper industry in Arizona.

In round numbers, from the year 1874—the year of my birth—down to 1939, Arizona produced $2,816,000,000 worth of copper, and this sum of money was expended as follows: For wages and salaries, $938,000,000; for supplies and equipment, $586,000,000; for taxes, State and Federal, $251,000,000; for freight on copper, $157,000,000; for refining, $173,000,000; for selling, $34,000,000; for insurance and replacements, and so forth, $130,000,000; for dividends, $547,000,000. These are round numbers.

Making, as I said before, a total of $2,816,000,000 of copper which Arizona has produced since I first saluted the dawn.

Mr. President, during the year 1937—I have no figures available since the year 1937—in the copper mines of the United States there were employed 24,900 persons, and in the copper smelters, mills, plants, and auxiliary works there were employed 22,315 persons, making a total of 47,215. These 47,215 employed persons subsisted about half a million persons.

Mr. President, withdraw the excise tax, and many, if not most, of the copper mines and smelters in the West would fall into deliquescence, would fall into disrepair; they would be abandoned. The plumes of smoke that now pour forth from the smelters would no longer be in the sky. The flashes of light from the smelters would no longer illuminate the midnight sky. Thousands of persons who are now employed at good wages would tread the streets of the towns and the copper camps, asking for employment; the dust of the desert would cover and the reptilia of the desert would soon inhabit those copper towns that have been built around the copper camps. Towns noted for their beauty and order, towns in which have been built temples of religion, temples of art, and temples of industry, would be destroyed under a doctrine of free trade or low tariffs.

Mr. President, it would be discourteous and impolite for me to trespass further upon the time of the able Senator from Missouri; but I thank him for giving me this opportunity to say a word.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the Senator from Arizona make remarks in any remarks I make whenever he so desires. I desire further to say that, much as I disagree with what I consider the very erroneous views of the Senator from Arizona on the tariff, so far as his service in this body is concerned the State of Arizona has honored itself as much as it has honored him by his repeated reelections.

It was not my purpose to enter into a debate as to these particular items; but, since the Senator has mentioned copper, I only desire to call his attention to the fact that the exportations of copper from this country—of course, we all recognize that copper is an export industry—increased from $16,065,000 in 1932 to $44,244,000 in 1936 and $79,492,000 in 1939.

I do not say that the reciprocal-trade agreements were entirely responsible for this increase; but I do call attention to the fact that the exportations of this great export commodity, copper, have multiplied under the Hull reciprocal trade agreements policy as against the exportations at the time of the beneficent Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. I further direct attention to the fact that exports of copper to non-trade-agreement countries have increased only 53.1 percent as against 74.1 percent to trade-agreement countries. So, Mr. President, in any way we please to take it, the record is favorable to the trade agreements.

Furthermore, in the case of another one of the commodities subject to these excise taxes, against the eloquent testimony of the Senator from Arizona as to the benefits which have come to the United States and the various industries of the United States I set the testimony of a very able and distinguished man, Dr. Wilson Compton, the technical head and adviser of the lumber industry of the United States, who said in a letter on December 22, 1938, addressed to the Lumber Manufacturers' Association:

> It is a mathematical certainty that during the past 10 years the industry has lost in foreign markets a greater volume of trade than it has gained through protection in domestic markets.

Mr. President, on the question of what the RECORD shows as to the promises which were held out either at the time of the enactment of the original trade-agreements measure or at the time of the consideration in 1937 of its extension, I desire to conclude by reading part of the proceedings of June 4, 1937, when the Long amendment was offered and rejected by the Senate, because it seems to me the action of the Senate on this matter is absolutely conclusive.

After the remarks of the Senator from Arizona which I read a few moments ago the following occurred:

> Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there are only a few moments remaining before the time for voting. I desire to say to the Senator from Arizona that I have offered this amendment in order to help his contention. I shall gladly withdraw the proposal.
> Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will pardon me. I have only 3 minutes on this bill.
> Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator desires to have the amendment withdrawn, I shall be delighted to withdraw it.
> Mr. ASHURST. I desire to have any amendment withdrawn which precludes the President from raising the tariff on copper.

Then there was some colloquy between the then Senator from Delaware, Mr. Hastings, and the then Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long, which resulted in the Senator from Louisiana reoffering the amendment for freezing the excise import duties upon the four commodities. I read further from the RECORD:

> The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.
> Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask the yeas and nays on that amendment.
> Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am willing to have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment. I desire to be heard for a minute.
> Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I am willing to take my chances. I am willing to leave it to Franklin D. Roosevelt as to whether or not the tariff shall be increased.
> Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I refuse to yield.
> The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield.
> Mr. LONG. I have but 5 minutes, and the Senator from Arizona has already spoken for 5 minutes.

Mr. President, we were given to understand and we were assured that copper, oil, coal, and lumber would not be affected by this bill; and, as one of the Senators who had received this assurance——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. No; I will not yield, Mr. President. I have only 5 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to know what effect the assurance the Senator received had on him. He apparently is not going to vote for the bill, anyway.

Mr LONG. Mr. President, I do not know what effect it had, except that I took them at their word.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that I withdrew the amendment.

Mr. LONG. I am not censuring the Senator from Mississippi. I am offering his amendment, which I presume he will support.

And which he did not support.

I believe he will.

Mr. President, we were told that these commodities would be protected because the tariffs we have on oil and lumber and coal and copper are very necessary.

I again call attention to the fact that the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long, with that frankness which was one of his great characteristics, did not attempt to call these excise duties, did not attempt to confuse them with internal-revenue taxes, but called them tariff duties. I continue the quotation:

Mr. President, we were told that these commodities would be protected because the tariffs we have on oil and lumber and coal and copper are very necessary. A number of Senators and I fought here many nights and many days to get tariffs on these items, and we want to protect them. We were assured that they would be protected. Today, as an example, notwithstanding the fact it is said we have an overproduction of oil in America, nonetheless we are importing into the country 260,000 barrels of oil a day. Notwithstanding all our lumber trouble and the cheapness of lumber, lumber is still being imported. We were told—and we believed—and I am sure Senators mean to stick by it, that we should have this tariff protection, and it would be disastrous to us if it were not given to us.

I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the yea-and-nay vote in the Senate on June 4, 1934, on the Long amendment, the result being, yeas 29, nays 57, which I insist is the pronouncement of policy upon this question by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HERRING in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the yea-and-nay vote was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). Repeating my statement made previously with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. NEELY'S name was called). I am authorized to state that were the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and its transfer as on previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). I repeat my former announcement as to my pair and transfer and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed], if present, would vote "yea" on this question. He is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo], as announced by the transfer of the pair of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson].

Mr. OVERTON. I inquire if the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator is not recorded as having voted.

Mr. OVERTON. I am paired with that Senator, and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 57, as follows:

Yeas, 29: Austin, Barbour, Carey, Coolidge, Couzens, Cutting, Davis, Dickinson, Fletcher, Frazier, Gibson, Goldsborough, Hale, Hastings, Hatfield, Hebert, Johnson, Kean, Keyes, Long, McNary, Metcalf, Schall, Steiwer, Thomas of Oklahoma, Townsend, Vandenberg, Walcott, and White.

Nays, 57: Adams, Ashurst, Bachman, Bailey, Bankhead, Barkley, Black, Bone, Borah, Brown, Bulkley, Bulow, Byrd, Byrnes, Capper, Caraway, Clark, Connally, Copeland, Costigan, Dieterich, Dill, Duffy, Erickson, George, Harrison, Hatch, Hayden, La Follette, Lewis, Logan, Lonergan, McCarran, McGill, McKellar, Murphy, Norbeck, Norris, Nye, O'Mahoney, Patterson, Pittman, Pope, Reynolds, Robinson of Arkansas, Russell, Sheppard, Shipstead, Smith, Stephens, Thomas of Utah, Thompson, Tydings, Van Nuys, Wagner, Walsh, and Wheeler.

Not voting, 10: Fess, Glass, Gore, King, McAdoo, Neely, Overton, Reed, Robinson of Indiana, Trammell.

So Mr. Long's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate by reading from the record the entire colloquy which took place on this subject in the Committee on Finance in 1937, but I do desire to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks certain quotations from the hearings before the Finance Committee on this subject on February 10, 11, 12, and 15, 1937, particularly colloquies between the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], Assistant Secretary of State Sayre, and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From hearings before Committee on Finance, United States Senate, February 1940, pp. 34–40]

Senator VANDENBERG. Dr. Sayre, under what clause of the law which you invoke to reach into the internal taxes would you also consider that you had the power to reach into the excise taxes on oil and copper and such?

Dr. SAYRE. The particular taxes to which you refer on oil and copper, and so forth, if I remember correctly, are levied upon importations, and I believe that there is a specific provision in section 601 of the Revenue Act, which is the one to which I think you refer, that they shall be treated as import taxes. Under that provision the Trade Agreements Act does delegate to the President the power to affect those particular excise taxes, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. Senator HARRISON made the statement on the floor of the Senate—I have it here somewhere—that specifically it was not the intention, either of the House or the Senate, to give you any power to deal with those excise taxes. Now, do you disagree with Senator HARRISON on that?

Mr. SAYRE. All I can do, sir, is to quote you the law. Under the law, you will remember, as I read a few moments ago, the President is authorized to proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or are appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. To that I would add the provision of section 601 of the revenue act which states that——

Senator VANDENBERG. At any rate, you interpret the situation which you are asking us to extend as giving you authority to reduce the excise taxes on oil, copper, and so forth?

Mr. SAYRE. To reduce, Senator, or to——

Senator VANDENBERG. To freeze?

Mr. SAYRE. To freeze; yes, sir. If I may read you the language of section 601, I think that is made clear.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by "freezing," Doctor?

Mr. SAYRE. Continuing without raising.

Senator VANDENBERG. I hope the Senator from Texas heard this answer, that he thinks his authority is broad enough even to affect the excise taxes on oil, copper, and so forth.

Mr. SAYRE. Under the provisions of section 601.

Senator VANDENBERG. Yes.

Senator CONNALLY. I understood that.

Senator VANDENBERG. When it passed the Senate it was specifically stated by the Senator from Mississippi on the floor that that power did not exist under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you got my statement there? I think I said it froze these propositions.

Senator VANDENBERG. No; your statement was a very gorgeous one—very conclusive.

Mr. SAYRE. Senator Vandenberg, these are, as you understand, under the language of section 601, treated as import taxes so that they could be frozen or they could be reduced.

Senator VANDENBERG. Senator Harrison asked me to read what he said——

The CHAIRMAN. I don't care anything about it, I will read it myself.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think I better read it now. On June 4, 1934, at page 10391 of the RECORD, the able chairman said:

"It will be noted that, so far as tariff rates are concerned, the President has the power to increase or lower them by 50 percent; but as to excise taxes, they may be continued. It was the intention of those who framed the legislation, and of the House in passing the bill, that they would be frozen; in other words, they might not be modified."

Is that your interpretation?

Mr. SAYRE. My interpretation is simply the reading of the law. I read you the provision in the Trade Agreements Act. I do not seem to have available here section 601 of the revenue act, but it contains a provision which directs that those particular excise taxes, which are levied on importations, shall be treated to all intents and purposes under the law as import taxes. As such, I presume they would be subject to either freezing or reduction under some trade agreement which might be made.

Senator VANDENBERG. Well, the importance to us is that you are now asking us to extend the power, and it is important to know which power you will contemplate using.

Senator CLARK. Dr. Sayre, let me understand this proposition correctly. I have been very much in sympathy with the reciprocal-trade agreements and feel that they have accomplished a great deal of good. But do I understand your proposition to be that in case of gasoline, let us say, on which we have levied an excise tax for years in this country—a nuisance tax, to be sure, but nevertheless an excellent revenue producer for the absolute necessities of the Government, and which this committee and the Congress have never found an opportunity to take off, although it is a burdensome tax by reason of the fact that the necessity for revenue is too desperate—do I understand that if the State Department was to happen to include gasoline in one of the reciprocal-trade agreements that that would automatically, if the State Department chose to do it, reduce or wipe out a tax that the Congress had been levying as an internal excise tax for its purposes?

Mr. SAYRE. No, sir. That is what I fear might be misunderstood from Senator VANDENBERG's question. There is no such power under the Trade Agreements Act.

Senator CLARK. I certainly did not understand that there was one when we passed the act.

Senator VANDENBERG. What power do you contemplate you have with respect to the internal tax on gasoline?

Mr. SAYRE. We have no power to do anything with respect to the internal tax on domestically produced gasoline. I come back to the language of the Trade Agreements Act, sir.

Senator CONNALLY. This is an excise tax on imported gasoline now.

Senator VANDENBERG. As I understand the Secretary, he says he has the power to deal with it.

Mr. SAYRE. I come back to the language of the act, which is that the President is authorized to proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions—and this next is the language which concerns the matter—"or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements."

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Sayre, since they brought my name into this discussion, for which I am sorry, it will be recalled that in the debate, as shown on page 10391 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for 1934, there came up some questions about this, and I stated I was offering an amendment.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And that amendment sought to freeze these excise duties, in particular on lumber, I think it was, copper, oil, and coal. When I offered that I thought a certain gentleman of the Senate would be glad to receive it, but he made an objection, one of the Senators did, and I had to withdraw it. Afterward the Senator from Louisiana offered it and it was objected to. * * *

Senator VANDENBERG. And it has bound the hands of Congress in respect to internal taxation?

Mr. SAYRE. No; that is putting it too strongly, sir; not in regard to internal taxation; only with regard to these very peculiar excise taxes on imported products. * * *

* * * Congress has delegated to the President the power to reduce tariffs on certain commodities and to bind United States excise taxes with respect to those imported commodities during the life of the trade agreement, but that does not cover internal taxation as such. It covers only excise taxes on imports. It covers only what is included in the specific language of this act.

Senator VANDENEERG. But an excise tax is an import tax so far as the net result is concerned?

Mr. SAYRE. Yes; insofar as imported goods are concerned; such an excise is a form of duty. But when you say the trade agreements give to the President the power to bind internal taxation, that is not true, because these excise taxes are only a very minor part of our internal-tax structure.

Senator CLARK. In this illustration that I asked you about a moment ago, this gasoline tax which is on the books right now is an excise tax. By every theory of taxation, the only theory on which it is imposed is as an excise tax. The same is true of all these nuisance taxes, the tax on jewelry, the tax on furs that we have, all of them are excise taxes. They are so classified by every tax authority and every lawyer that I have ever heard make a classification.

Senator VANDENBERG. Would you say you had the power to agree with England that the internal tax on British cigarettes sold in this country could not be raised?

Mr. SAYRE. I would want to consult a good many lawyers before I answered a question like that, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think, on the basis of the Brazilian precedent, your answer would be "yes."

Mr. SAYRE. I would want to consult a good many lawyers.

Senator VANDENBERG. Then we better consult a good many lawyers before we extend this act.

Mr. SAYRE. Remember, Senator—I come back again and again to this—that these excise taxes are very peculiar, that with a single exception there has been no binding of them apart from the trade agreements with Colombia, with Brazil, and with Cuba. In those trade agreements excise taxes on imported goods were bound only with respect to commodities largely tropical and not directly competitive with commodities in this country. * * *

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in the Finance Committee hearings on House Joint Resolution 96 references were made by several witnesses to the matter of internal taxes, excise taxes, and related subjects under the trade-agreements program. The following witnesses commented on this phase: Mr. Holman, pages 296, 297, 298; Mr. Wheeler, pages 325, 326; and Mr. Loomis, pages 505, 506. The testimony of these gentlemen was directed, however, to the broad question of "binding the hands of Congress respecting internal taxes," and did not relate solely to the questionable authority of the President to modify the excise taxes on coal, oil, lumber, and copper.

When the joint resolution was being considered in executive session by the Finance Committee, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] offered the following amendment:

Provided, That after the enactment of this resolution no trade agreement shall include any provision in any way limiting the power of Congress over internal taxes.

This amendment was rejected in the committee by a vote of 13 to 5.

It might be pointed out that the report of the Finance Committee contains reference to the continuance of excise treatment under the original Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, and it is naturally implied that the previous position taken by the Department is approved by the committee in its report.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, lest what I said a moment ago might be construed as a reflection on Secretary Hull, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me to make a short statement regarding the Secretary of State?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. There is no man now alive for whom I have greater respect than the present Secretary of State, Mr. Hull. Indeed, I believe that his conduct of our foreign relations has been as able and as noble as that of any previous Secretary of State, and in many particulars shines like a beacon light on a dark and stormy ocean. The fact that I think he is wrong in his view as to these reciprocal-trade agreements, and that I believe they are baleful to our country, does not indicate that I have lessened in my affection and respect for Secretary Hull as a man. Indeed, it would be very dull to have to go through life and be required to agree with one merely because we were fond of him. At times we disagree with Senators although we may have great affection for them, and while I think that the Secretary of State is in error in his conclusions as to these trade treaties, and while I believe they will lead to no good to our country, and certainly no good to the Democratic Party, I should be lacking in fairness if I failed to say that I esteem the Secretary of State as a worthy man and high-minded official of great ability.

Moreover, Mr. President, I am not irritated because the able Senator from Missouri has adverted to the colloquy of 1934. It is legitimate debate. He would be derelict in the performance of his duty to present his case if he did not direct our attention to what occurred on the occasion to which he refers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say to the Senator, if I may, that I refer to that colloquy only for the purpose of establishing what the understanding and belief in the Senate were at that time.

Mr. ASHURST. I am so persuaded of the fairness and propriety of presenting the colloquy that I had intended to be in the Chamber at 12 o'clock today and to make a short speech referring to it myself, to show how much we may be mistaken in our estimates of men and measures. It seems odd when we reflect that I could have believed in 1934 that Franklin D. Roosevelt as President, and Secretary Hull as Secretary of State, would have increased the tariff. I believed that, and so did many other men whose processes of thought and avenues of information were more nearly accurate than my own.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to refer to just one or two remarks in the testimony which I have just obtained permission to have inserted in the RECORD, and to give a brief summary of the colloquy, because the question of the power and authority of the administration, of the President of the United States to change the taxes on these very four items was the subject of the debate. It was brought up by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] who asked the direct question of the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Sayre, as to whether he considered that under the provisions of the act which was then sought to be extended the President had a right to interfere with excise taxes. Mr. Sayre explicitly replied that it was his construction and that of the State Department that under the provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, having in mind the provisions of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, which specifically made those excise duties part of the Tariff Act of 1930, the President did have the right to change those excise duties. Then I asked the Assistant Secretary whether he meant to be understood by that answer as contending that the President or the State Department had the power to change domestic excise taxes, such as the tax on cigarettes, or the tax on beer or whisky, or the tax on gasoline or the so-called nuisance taxes, and the Assistant Secretary of State drew a clear and inescapable distinction between the two classes of excise taxes, one being so-called excise taxes on imports which, by the terms of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, were specifically import duties, and the other being the ordinary internal-revenue taxes in this country, with which we have always been familiar. He contended that it was the opinion of the State Department that the first, that is, the import excise duties, were affected and subject to the provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, and that the others were not.

Every member of the committee understood that. I think every member of the Senate understood it, and when the measure came to the Senate floor the Senator from Michigan offered an amendment to the joint resolution extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act not dealing with these four specific duties, but merely asserting that the President did not have authority to change excise taxes. I have forgotten what the vote was, but he got hardly enough votes to count, and did not even have a roll call on it. So the record, so far as any promises, or agreements, or understandings as to what was to be done on this matter are concerned, is not as my good friend the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] understood it to be, from his statement this morning.

Mr. President, I insist that the action of the Senate itself on June 4, 1934, in voting down the Long amendment freezing these four excise taxes, is an indication that the Senate did not want to do what is proposed to be done now under the amendment pending before the Senate. I submit that there is no rhyme or reason or justification whatever for merely picking four items out of a thousand items in a tariff bill and saying, "These are sacred. We have to be sure that these particular items are to be sacred before we will let you enter on a broad policy of upbuilding the foreign trade of the United States, and promoting the domestic prosperity of the United States."

Mr. HARRISON rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make some remarks?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS (and other Senators). Vote! Vote!

Mr. HARRISON. I may suggest to the Senator from Nebraska and other Senators who suggest a vote, that some Senators had been assured that they could leave today, and that no vote would be taken today, because we have an agreement to limit debate tomorrow.

LOANS MADE UNDER RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ACT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it will be remembered that week before last, in debate in the Senate on the agricultural appropriation bill, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] took issue with respect to the accounting and the work done under the rural-electrification program, and said he had been unable to obtain information concerning that organization of the Government. He said particularly, as I recall, that he had been refused information concerning it; and at that time I promised to secure that information and present it to the Senate. I have that information, and I shall now present it. The Senator also said he had seen little or no evidence that the loans to be made under the Rural Electrification Act "are really good loans," and declared that we ought to have figures to support the contention that the R. E. A. loans are good loans. I agree that we should have; but I do not agree that such evidence is not available. There is plenty of evidence, and I shall present some of it as well as I can in a limited time.

I am profoundly interested in the rural-electrification program, both in my own State of Tennessee and in the Nation generally. The reasons are not far to seek. Countless farmers tell us—and I know it is true—that our Government has inaugurated few activities that have meant as much to the farm family—in the terms of increased comfort, shortened hours of labor, lightened drudgery, and in general a happier and worthier way of life—as the R. E. A. program. Because of the contribution R. E. A. has already made, and promises to continue to make, to the betterment of farm life—because of its fine social and human values—I want to see its work go on.

The achievement of R. E. A., now rounding out its fifth year of financing electric distribution systems to serve the farmers of the United States, is well known. I need do no more than summarize briefly the high points of its program. Since its establishment in May 1935, R. E. A. has allotted approximately $270,000,000 to 689 borrowers, designed to finance a quarter of a million miles of new rural electric lines and a few generating plants that will make service available to 850,000 farm families and other rural users. By the end of February 1940, 579 R. E. A. financed systems had been energized. These included 190,000 miles of lines, with 463,000 consumers already connected, and thousands more being added each month. In addition, the work of R. E. A. has acted as a powerful stimulus to the rural-development programs of private utility companies. In 1935, when rural electrification was practically at a standstill, power-company executives declared that rural lines were being extended as rapidly as was economically feasible. Yet since that date, and since the Rural Electrification Administration program got under way, the private utilities have extended electric service to nearly as many additional farms as they had undertaken to serve in the preceding quarter century. In the light of their lethargy earlier, I think it is only fair to credit R. E. A. with a large share in awakening the private companies to the opportunities of present-day rural electrification and in promoting the extension of service by R. E. A. borrowers and by the utilities, in less than 5 years, to nearly a million additional farms. For a more detailed account of the progress of rural electrification I call the Senate's attention to the statement inserted at page 4923 of the RECORD of March 21, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The Administrator of R. E. A., in his annual report for 1939, submitted to the Congress on February 16, pointed out in some detail the reasons why this unprecedented expansion of rural electric service has been possible. Under R. E. A. financing the cost of constructing a mile of rural line has been sharply cut, from an average of around $1,500 a mile to something like $750. Simplification of construction, adoption of assembly-line methods, building of comparatively large mileages under contracts let after competitive bidding—all these factors have contributed to the economy of R. E. A. construction. More important from the social point of view, R. E. A. has insisted on the fullest possible development of a given area, taking electric service to every farm that could possibly be served, in clear and telling contrast to the older practice of utility companies, which "skimmed the cream" by serving only the more prosperous farms and condemning the less well off to years of darkness and drudgery.

The question is often raised, "How is it possible for R. E. A. borrowers to extend electric service on a self-liquidating basis if private utilities cannot do so?" That question has been asked more than once. It was implied in some of the remarks made in the debate on the appropriation for R. E. A. here last Thursday. It is a fair question, and one which every friend of rural electrification is glad to answer. One answer, I think, is the fact I have already cited—that since the establishment of R. E. A. the private utilities have come to realize that widespread rural electrification is economically feasible. No more convincing evidence is needed than the 600,000 farms to which they have extended service in the past 4 or 5 years. And yet, as Mr. Slattery's report shows, there is even more convincing evidence. Referring to the more favorable areas in which R. E. A. has financed new electric lines, Mr. Slattery states:

No further proof is required of the bright prospects of the R. E. A. systems serving these areas than the repeated unsuccessful attempts the utilities have since made to buy them out.

In the less favorable areas, as the annual report of R. E. A. further demonstrates, the combination of strict economy in construction with education for fuller and more productive use of the newly acquired electric power has produced a very healthy outlook for most of these systems. And with the growing sense of cooperation among the farmers served by these lines, and their increasing knowledge of the value of electricity when wisely and liberally used, the outlook seems to become steadily healthier.

The junior Senator from Ohio alluded on Thursday to what he considers a great dearth of specific information on the financial condition of these R. E. A. financed cooperatives. He seemed to think that no facts at all were available. On the contrary, we find that the hearings of the House Appropriations Committee contain considerable information on the payments and defaults of nearly 100 R. E. A. borrowers. The annual report of the Administrator—whose accuracy certainly I would never impugn—presents a series of facts that encourage my belief in the soundness of R. E. A. loans and R. E. A. In particular I should like to call attention to the following very pertinent statements appearing on pages 134–135 of the R. E. A. report:

NO CHARGE-OFFS OR LOSSES

Under the Rural Electrification Act, the Rural Electrification Administration advances 100 percent of the funds necessary not only for the building of the line but for other overhead incident to the construction loan—such items as engineering fees, legal fees, etc. Not a dollar of the loans, totaling over $176,000,000 advanced up to December 1, 1939, has been charged off by R. E. A. or transferred to an inactive account, although in financial experience generally such charge-offs are quite common. No losses have been experienced on any loans, and there have been no foreclosures.

DEFAULTED PAYMENTS

Twenty-seven installments of interest and principal on outstanding loans remained unpaid on June 30, 1939, and were thereby defaulted. The borrowers, however, are being granted extensions of time to pay interest and principal in accordance with section 12 of the Rural Electrification Act which authorizes the Administrator to extend the time of payment of principal or interest of loans for power systems for a period not in excess of 5 years. The payments allowed to become past due were in situations where the old 20-year-payment plan was in effect with its accelerated scale of payment. None of these situations is a result of impaired assets or operating conditions which cannot be remedied. In many instances the difficulty lay in the fact that circumstances beyond the control of the borrower, such as injunctions by private interests, had delayed construction or energization and the inflow of operating revenue. Some of the systems affected have since shown an accelerated growth. The total of such defaulted payments was $65,616.30.

On R. E. A.'s wiring and plumbing installation loan contracts, under which $2,114,315 had been advanced up to December 1, 1939, collections showed less than 1 percent delinquencies. No extensions of time have been granted on any of these loans. Furthermore, full interest and principal payments begin 6 months after the date of the note.

Especially encouraging is the fact that a number of R. E. A. borrowers have made substantial payments well ahead of the dates on which they were to fall due, as shown by the following section of the Annual Report (p. 133):

ELEVEN BORROWERS PAY IN ADVANCE

Indeed, some of the earlier established systems have shown up so well in point of revenues, that 11 of the cooperatives and other borrowers have made—or, in one instance, is about to make—substantial payments of interest and principal in advance. The Green River Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation of Owensboro, Ky., recently paid $6,000 to wipe out interest accumulated but not yet due and made an advance payment on principal of $10,000.

Similarly, the Inter-County Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation of Danville, Ky., has requested authority for payment of $6,000 for interest charges not yet due, and of $4,000 in advance on principal.

Eight other borrowers made interest and principal payments in advance, repaying obligations which will fall due on various dates in 1940 and 1941. These systems are: Illini Electric Cooperative, of Champaign, Ill.; the Jackson County Rural Electric Membership Corporation, of Brownstown, Ind.; the Amana Society Service Co., of Amana, Iowa; the Maquoketa Valley Rural Electric Cooperative, of Anamosa, Iowa; the Benton County Electric Cooperative Association, of Vinton, Iowa; the Salt River Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation, of Bardstown, Ky.; the Pitt & Greene Electric Membership Corporation, of Farmville, N. C.; and the Duck River Electric Membership Corporation, of Shelbyville, Tenn.

Another such borrower is the Anoka County Cooperative Light & Power Association, of Anoka, Minn., whose system did not go into operation until March 1938. In May 1939, little more than a year after it began serving its farmer members, it found itself with a substantial amount of cash in the bank from the excess of revenues over operating costs. The only payment falling due on its loan was one of about $1,000 for interest on June 1. On its own motion, the cooperative paid to R. E. A. all interest which had accrued but would not become due for some time, amounting to approximately $6,000.

A few weeks later a tornado hit the cooperative's system at the one spot where it could do the most damage; it utterly demolished the substation. The cooperative still had sufficient resources to restore service and complete repairs.

The total of the advance payments made or about to be made by the 11 borrowers mentioned is $79,594.70.

I believe that most people will agree with me that those statements contain a good deal of specific information, and that the disclosures of defaulted payments reveal considerably more frankness than the Senator from Ohio has been willing to attribute to R. E. A. Furthermore, when I asked the Administrator whether he could bring those two figures, the figures on advance payments and on defaults, a little more up to date, he was good enough to provide me with figures for January 1, 1940. By that date advance payments of interest and principal made out of operating revenues amounted to $140,643. I ask whether that is not an excellent showing, particularly when we remember, as the Senator from Nebraska pointed out in the debate a few days ago, that all rural electric enterprises, whether public, private, or cooperative, require a period of growth of perhaps 5 years before they attain their full development. Not one of the systems financed by R. E. A. has been energized for so long a time.

Installments in arrears on January 1, 1940, totaled $56,765. In explanation of this figure, Mr. Slattery tells me that it represents current delinquencies; that is, payments now overdue according to the requirements of loan contracts now in effect. The reduction over the earlier figure is accounted for by rescheduling of the terms of payment, a subject to which I shall return later. Here I wish simply to point out that the early administration of R. E. A. set terms for the beginning of payment of interest and principal on a very rigorous basis. This was done with the intent of extension in particular instances according to particular circumstances, such as delays in construction and energization, and therefore the earning of income, beyond the control of a borrower.

From time to time we hear demands from various quarters that these new and still developing cooperative associations submit, for public inspection, detailed reports of their operations. Some of them have done so. Other cooperatives have been more cautious. R. E. A. has been cautious too, since it is a fair question just how far the agency should go in revealing detailed figures on the cooperatives it has financed. A banker would ordinarily consider it his duty to inform himself of operations in appraising the soundness of a loan; but he would certainly not consider it his privilege to disclose confidential business reports. R. E. A. is in much the same position. Moreover, when we trace the origin of some of these demands for information, that caution seems only the part of wisdom. Within the past 2 months an editorial demanding such reports was circulated widely in many States. Some cooperative officials, recognizing in its vituperative tone another hand than that of the local editor, took the trouble to find out the source of the editorial. Their investigations established that it was the work of the Hofer syndicate, of Portland, Oreg., a so-called news service which, the Federal Trade Commission hearings several years ago disclosed, had collected $84,820 a year from various utilities and a like amount from other industrial concerns. Of course, in sending out the editorial the Hofer firm did not inform local editors that it had ever received such subsidies.

I am told, too, that these cooperatives frequently receive questionnaires from other agencies which are closely associated with, or sponsored by, private utility interests. These questionnaires attempt to probe deeply into figures on such points as number of members connected, amount of energy purchased at wholesale and sold at retail, rates, revenues, and related items. Since the cooperatives are still in an early developmental stage, it is perfectly natural that their showing would be less favorable than it would be after they had been in operation for a reasonable period. Every figure is, therefore, a weapon to be turned against them, and I can, therefore, see very clearly, and I believe that every true friend of rural electrification can see, that the publication of these figures at this time might in certain instances have a very unfortunate effect on the R. E. A. cooperatives. Of course, the Congress, which has the responsibility for authorizing these loans, has the right and, indeed, the duty to satisfy itself as to their soundness and the outlook for their repayment. But we can—and should—do so without exposing these young cooperatives to the hostile attacks of those who would like to scuttle this program.

The Senator from Ohio asserted on the floor of the Senate last Thursday that the R. E. A. financed cooperatives "have not earned the interest" on their loans from the Government. This seemed without foundation, and I asked Mr. Slattery, the Administrator of R. E. A., to give me some figures on it. He has given me a statement which I should like to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It shows that of the energized systems financed by R. E. A., 280 had, by February 29, 1940, made payments of interest and principal out of operating revenues. With reference to these payments from revenues, I wish to call attention to one of the provisions of many of the loan contracts covering this R. E. A. financing. Under this provision payments are not required until 30 months after the loan contract is executed. This fact in substantial part accounts for the difference between the number of systems energized—579—and the number appearing in this table—280—as making payments out of revenues.

Of course, the deferring of payments for 30 months does not wholly account for the difference. Some of the R. E. A. financed cooperatives have very small revenues as yet, and have had to meet their early interest payments out of loan funds, as so many new enterprises do. Some few are in default, as I have pointed out. That fact, as I have already shown, was candidly revealed in the 1939 annual report. The report also reveals at least one very significant reason for many of these defaults. On the earlier loans, a 20-year maximum repayment period was provided for in the loan contracts, with payments of interest scheduled to begin long before anything approaching full development of the systems could possibly have taken place. The Rural Electrification Act of 1936 was drawn with a clear recognition of the need for a development period, and authorized the substitution of the 25-year maximum period of repayment. On a number of these loans, therefore, the extension has been granted, and where it appears desirable a rescheduling to the longer term is now in process for other loans. All revisions that have been made have been kept within the terms of the 25-year schedule, while on many other loans the 20-year terms have been retained, even though they appear generally less appropriate, simply because there has been no need, thus far at least, to change them.

The Senator from Ohio also remarked last Thursday that if we could produce evidence that a single rural electric cooperative has earned the interest on its indebtedness, he thought it should be inserted in the RECORD. After a brief discussion of some figures I have obtained from R. E. A., I shall be happy to comply with his request.

Now about Tennessee. Naturally, I am most keenly interested in the progress of the R. E. A. financed cooperatives in my own State, which lies in the T. V. A. area. It is, of course, true that these cooperatives enjoy the benefit of the unusually low T. V. A. rates for wholesale power. But, let us remember that their retail rates are correspondingly low, and that, moreover, they are operating in rural areas where the average of farm income is low. I have looked into the financial condition of the projects in Tennessee and I find it very encouraging indeed. In December 1939 there were 13 projects in operation in my State, with 34,720 consumers actually taking service. The gross revenue of these 13 systems for that month was $131,784. Their operating expenses, including the cost of purchased power, taxes, and depreciation, came to $95,610. This leaves an earned net revenue of $36,174 to cover current interest expenses of $14,433, and means that for the group as a whole interest expenses were earned two and a third times. Up to December 31, 1939, these Tennessee projects had made, out of revenue, interest and principal payments to R. E. A. totaling $84,339. Needless to say, some of them are doing better than others. One of them has made no such payments at all. On the other hand, a majority of them have made substantial payments from their operating revenues. The Southwest Tennessee Electric Cooperative, for example, had paid from revenues a total of $21,609 up to December 13, 1939, while close behind came the Volunteer Electric Cooperative, with $19,928. Or, looking at the question from another point of view, the Southwest Tennessee Electric Cooperative had an interest expense for December 1939 of $1,447, while its net operating revenue, available to meet these interest requirements, was $3,444, or two and one-third times as great. The Volunteer Cooperatives makes an even more favorable showing, with $1,184 of interest expense and $4,654, or four times the interest requirement, as net operating revenue. Certainly these figures do not lead me to conclude, as the Senator from Ohio has asserted, that it is doubtful that we shall ever get back more than one-half of what we actually advance to these R. E. A. projects. On the contrary, the figures seem to indicate that by and large these R. E. A. loans will be, as they are intended to be, self-liquidating.

In Tennessee we have a large rural population scattered among our 95 counties. Lines financed by R. E. A. are already energized in sections of 36 of Tennessee's counties, and are in progress in 16 others. I look forward to the time when farm families in every county in Tennessee will have the advantages of low-cost T. V. A. electricity through their own R. E. A. financed cooperatives. The number of Tennessee farms with central-station electric service has tripled since December 1934, and yet nearly 90 percent of Tennessee's 288,000 farms are without service. In the eastern half of the State the need for rural electrification is especially acute. There hundreds of thousands of hard-working, self-reliant men, women, and children on the upland farms are still chained to primitive hardship and toil. Their sinew and their backbone have toughened the sinew and backbone of America; yet America, in her progress, has until now largely passed them by. Electric power, in Tennessee as in every other State in the Union, can do much to bring our farm people abreast of modern life. It is our responsibility, through forwarding the R. E. A. program, to see that it does.

I am proud of the progress Tennessee has made in this field and hope the time may soon come when every county and every farm will have rural electrification.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the tables and other material presented in connection with this matter may be printed in the RECORD at this point, as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HERRING in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely the nomination of James Earl Evans to be postmaster at Carrollton, Mo., in place of Lee Dickson.

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of William M. Lindsay, of Kansas, to be United States marshal for the district of Kansas, vice Lon Warner, removed.

NOMINATION OF MATTHEW F. M'GUIRE—EXECUTIVE REPORT OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Judiciary Committee, I submit a favorable report upon the nomination of Matthew F. McGuire, of Massachusetts, to be the Assistant to the Attorney General, vice Edward G. Kemp, resigned.

Mr. President, I may say that Mr. McGuire was appointed to the Department of Justice in 1934 as a special attorney in the Criminal Division, and has steadily advanced through the various degrees in the Department until he has now been nominated for the second place in the Department.

He has the rather unusual distinction nowadays of having been a school teacher, a newspaperman, and a most successful lawyer. He was graduated from Holy Cross College with a bachelor of arts degree in 1921. Thereafter he studied law at Boston University, from which he was graduated in 1926. In the meantime, in 1923, he established a weekly newspaper at Charlestown, Mass., in the shadow of Bunker Hill. While still a newspaperman, having already taught school in Boston for a year, he entered upon the practice of law in the city of Boston, where he was associated with the present Attorney General of Massachusetts, Mr. Paul Dever.

He has had a notable career. In the Department of Justice as a special attorney he aided materially in the drafting of the law, popularly known as the Lindbergh kidnaping law. His knowledge and experience were also called upon in the writing of other Federal crime laws, which were enacted a few years ago for the purpose of eliminating gangsterism.

This was followed by his promotion to be an associate of the Assistant to the Attorney General. In that capacity he supervised personnel, and, upon the resignation of Joseph B. Keenan, Mr. McGuire acted as the Assistant Attorney General. A year ago he was named to a newly created post of Special Assistant Attorney General, and in that capacity acted as liaison officer between the Attorney General and Congress and other agencies and departments of the Government. He also handled confidential, special legal, and administrative matters. The duties of the latter office will be combined with the duties of his new important post.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters on the calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc, with the exception of the first nomination on the calender, that of Dorothy B. Keeling to be postmaster at Camp Taylor, Ky., which I ask go over under the previous request made by the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters on the calendar will be confirmed en bloc, with the exception of the first nomination, which will be passed over.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATION OF DOROTHY B. KEELING

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, my attention was directed to another matter for a moment. I wish to refer to the first nomination on the calendar. For several days the nomination of Dorothy B. Keeling to be postmaster at Camp Taylor, Ky., has gone over at my request, because I had received some communications asking that it be held up. I have indicated to those who protested that if there was anything they could present concerning the qualifications or character of this lady I would submit it to the Senate. But nothing of that sort has been brought to my attention. It is rather a contest between applicants for this appointment, and I have no desire to hold it up any longer. I ask that the nomination of Dorothy B. Keeling to be postmaster at Camp Taylor, Ky., be confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 2, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we praise Thee that Thou hast made Thyself known to us through Jesus Christ our Lord. Through Him we have words for our tongues, thoughts for our minds, and light for our eyes; oh, be Thou unto us a Saviour. Take from our hearts our burdens as we help others to lift theirs. Keep us from being narrow and willful, that our daily desire may be to walk with Thee in new strength, new beauty, and in new joy. Heavenly Father, if faith is the victory that overcometh the world, arm us with its power; if it be better to minister than to be ministered unto, teach us that the lowliest duty done is the highest service unto Thee; if love is better than hate and will help us bear all things, endure all things, and will last when prophecies fail and tongues cleave the dust, O God, wing our words that they may reach the hidden depths of many a heart. Scatter every cloud of doubt, that we may gather from the fields of abounding faith the living sheaves that are to be written in the Lamb's Book of Life. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 29, 1940, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FRAZIER, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 200. Joint resolution to provide for participation of the United States in the Golden Gate International Exposition at San Francisco in 1940, to continue the powers and duties of the United States Golden Gate International Exposition Commission, and for other purposes.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, insist on the House disagreement to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. TAYLOR, WOODRUM of Virginia, CANNON of Missouri, LUDLOW, SNYDER, O'NEAL, JOHNSON of West Virginia, TABER, WIGGLESWORTH, LAMBERTSON, and DITTER.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge the Subcommittee on Appropriations that handles the money for the W. P. A. to bring in a resolution appropriating sufficient money to keep 2,100,000 people on the W. P. A. rolls during May and June. This morning I had a conference with Col. F. C. Harrington, Administrator of the W. P. A., who stated that while they had reduced their rolls for the month of April 200,000 below the number carried during March, he had not made any announcement as to what might happen during May and June. Colonel Harrington stated that during the month of March 2,300,000 people were on the W. P. A. rolls and that the money allocated to the various States for the month of April would only take care of 2,100,000 and that they started to work on that basis today.

Colonel Harrington further advised me if the W. P. A. rolls are to carry 2,100,000 during May and June, about $38,000,000 additional will be needed by the W. P. A. This was in response to my inquiry. I also find that there are 1,000,000 people in the United States who, after an investigation, have been certified as being eligible for employment on W. P. A. who cannot be taken care of due to a lack of funds. These people are out of employment, have dependents, and naturally must look to the cities and States for assistance. I further learned that the W. P. A. has only been able to put back to work two-thirds of the number who were furloughed as a result of the 18-month clause in the existing law, that the balance, one-third, have been certified, all have dependents, but cannot be taken care of unless additional money is secured. It is my understanding that vacancies are not being filled as W. P. A. workers resign to accept private employment, but the number resigning is not sufficient to absorb the entire reduction that is necessary.

I am in favor of reducing expenditures where it is possible but not at the expense of men and women who have dependents who cannot secure work in private industry. A critical situation confronts the country, and I cannot see how the Congress is going to be able to refuse to appropriate additional money for W. P. A., not only between now and June 30, but for the next fiscal year. Business will certainly feel this reduction as the purchasing power of the people is being reduced. The cities and States say they will be unable to carry any additional load. I know in my State and city money available for direct relief will not enable St. Louis and the State of Missouri to take care of those who will be necessarily furloughed from W. P. A. if additional money is not made available.

Colonel Harrington will appear before the Appropriations Committee Tuesday and make a detailed statement in reference to the situation and I hope the committee will act immediately on a deficiency appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in asking for this 1 minute was to reemphasize many of the things the gentleman from Missouri has said and to add just one more statement. The time for a reduction in Government employment of the unemployed is when private employment is increasing. That time is not now. It would require $86,800,000 to prevent any cuts in the W. P. A. rolls for the balance of this fiscal year. As a means of making this proposition definite, I am today introducing a deficiency appropriation bill to provide that amount of money for W. P. A. employment between now and the 1st of July.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I have placed on the Clerk's desk this morning a motion to discharge a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7240, which was introduced by me last year following the consideration of the relief bill by the House. This bill does the same thing the House did when it placed in the relief bill a provision that heads of families aged 45 and over should not be subjected to the automatic lay-off under the 18-month employment clause.

HOUSE ACTION RECALLED

If the Members of the House will recall, when the emergency relief appropriation bill of 1939 was before them, an amendment, which I sponsored and which is recorded on page 7363 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 16, 1939, was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole by teller vote and remained in the bill as passed by the House. However, the provision was later stricken in conference.

The amendment provided for the exemption of heads of families, 45 years of age and over, from the automatic separation from the Work Projects Administration at the end of an 18-month period of employment.

My astonishment at the action of the conferees was properly expressed when the conference report was presented to the House on June 30, and my remarks at that time were as follows:

> An exemption to the automatic 60-day lay-off for heads of families—men and women—45 years and over with dependents was my amendment passed in the House by a teller vote; and now to realize that that humanitarian provision has been eliminated by the conferees comes as a distinct surprise to the membership of this body. In my opinion, the W. P. A., by the very nature of its set-up, should be a secure place for those in need of its humanitarian provisions, especially those of the age referred to and heads of families. Everyone knows a man or woman with dependents can save nothing on W. P. A. wages. The dread of the automatic lay-off period will prove a continuous worry throughout the period of employment. Perhaps legislation to correct this injustice is the answer.

Time has demonstrated the truth of my prediction. You will note that my remarks were concluded with the statement, "Perhaps legislation to correct this injustice is the answer."

CORRECTIVE MEASURE PROPOSED

Accordingly, on July 14, I introduced in the House, H. R. 7240, a bill to exempt certain persons with dependents from the provisions requiring separation from the Work Projects Administration rolls at the end of 18 months, which bill has been referred to the Appropriations Committee. In substance it champions the rights of heads of families, 45 and over, and seeks the same results as my amendment to which I have just referred.

Although it was manifestly the will of this House to include this exemption in the original bill, to date no action has been taken by the committee. Therefore, I am asking the Members of Congress to sign a petition which was placed on the Journal clerk's desk this morning. This is a motion to discharge the committee from consideration of H. R. 7240 and will bring this measure to the floor. As I stated, this matter has already been discussed and adopted, but in view of later evidence and obvious need for such corrective legislation, I suggest that we once more study the subject.

SURVEY PROVES INHUMANITY OF AUTOMATIC LAY-OFF

In July and August more than 775,000 W. P. A. project workers were dropped from their jobs in accordance with the 18-month provision of 1939 Relief Act. In November, 2 to 3 months after their dismissal, a survey was made covering 138,000 of these workers in 23 large and representative cities.

The facts of this survey, which was conducted by the Research Division of the Work Projects Administration, were set forth in a report by Col. F. C. Harrington, Commissioner of the Work Projects Administration, to the gentleman from Virginia, Representative CLIFTON R. WOODRUM, of the House Appropriations Committee, on January 26, 1940. The facts set forth in this survey are such as to prove the correctness of the decision of the House when they wrote the provision protecting from dismissal from the service, heads of families, 45 and over. What does the survey show as to W. P. A. workers dismissed under the 18-month rule, known as the dismissal clause? In spite of the fact that the dismissals occurred during a period of sharply rising industrial activities, less than 13 out of every 100 were found to have jobs as much as 3 months after the lay-off. Approximately half of these having jobs were earning less than the security wage they previously had earned on the W. P. A.

Colonel Harrington explained that the number finding jobs was no greater proportionately to those who would have left the rolls of their own accord, since voluntary separations have averaged over 100,000 a month during the last calendar year. The majority of these leave the W. P. A. to take jobs in private employment.

The survey also brought out that as late as November, of the 87 out of each 100 who did not have jobs, 28 were on local relief rolls, 27 have been reassigned to the W. P. A. and 32 were without public support of any kind, save what they could procure through surplus commodities. More than three-fourths of those who had not returned to the W. P. A. in November were subsisting on incomes below their previous earnings as project workers. In none of the 23 cities surveyed was the average income of this group—including wages of those privately employed, relief grants, and the value of food, fuel, and clothing distribution—as much as $14 a week. In 10 of the 23 cities it was less than $5. More than 100,000 of all those dismissed had no income whatever in the 2 weeks preceding the survey. Dismissals in accordance with the provision between July 1 and August 31 totaled nearly one-third of the total number employed as of July 1.

The study indicates that the average weekly earnings of those who had jobs when interviewed in November was $17.22, while 21.2 percent received less than $10 per week. The most critical conditions were experienced by those workers—nearly one-third of all those dismissed—who did not have private jobs when interviewed in November, who were not returned to the W. P. A., and for whom no direct relief was available. Forty percent of this group reported no income whatever during a period of 2 weeks before they were interviewed.

In summary, the results of this survey, which was made 2 to 3 months after the dismissal of these 775,000 W. P. A. workers, are set forth below:

CHART A

Status	Number of individuals	Percentage of total
Private jobs	94,225	12.7

This break-down of the facts is a compliment to the decision of the House of Representatives, but a sad commentary on the action of the conferees in permitting this humanitarian amendment to be stricken from the bill.

THE HOUSE WILL HAVE ITS WAY

I know the temper of this House. I feel I know their interest in the fathers and mothers, heads of families, forced to rely on the W. P. A. Therefore I know that it will come as a shock to all of you when you realize that 37 percent of the thousands of these workers who were dismissed were 45 years of age or older. These are the persons who have fought a losing battle and who have come to a point where they are no longer wanted by private industry. But because of the clause in the relief act were forced out of the ranks of the W. P. A. in spite of the fact that they have dependents looking to them for the necessities of life.

As I have said, the House tried to protect this large group who are heads of families, but because of the action of the conference the wishes of the Members were disregarded. It was stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] that he could not see the "inhumanity" in the 18-month dismissal clause; in fact, he considered that it was "eminently proper and fair." But now, in view of the facts which have been made known to us by the Work Projects Administration survey, we know that it has been anything but humanitarian in its results.

When we realize that 37 percent of the persons dismissed under the clause are 45 years of age or older, then we can understand the terrific hardships which have resulted from the conference action in eliminating the exemption of these people from the harsh dismissal clause.

PLEA TO SIGN DISCHARGE PETITION NO. 27

In conclusion, I make a plea to each of you as individuals and to all of you as Members of the House of Representatives to sign discharge petition No. 27 in order that we may rectify the errors of the past. Not a person can doubt my sincerity, and I was never more sincere than I am this morning. This injustice to the heads of families 45 years of age and over should be corrected. It is the duty of this House, and there is no more powerful manner in which to present the will of this House to the Subcommittee on Appropriations having this matter under consideration than to sign this discharge petition No. 27. I ask your cooperation.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday next may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein two letters to the Attorney General.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

THE CENSUS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in view of the hullabaloo raised by some of the Members of the House and of the Senate concerning a few of the questions on the schedules for the Sixteenth Census, I believe it is well to realize this hullabaloo is not universal throughout the Nation. Objections, based on claims that the census questions violate constitutional rights, and dire forebodings that they threaten the integrity of our American democracy and even the Republic itself, do not appear to be shared by the citizens of the First Congressional District of Colorado. The intelligent and ever-alert people of Denver are always most jealous of their liberties. I am happy to say they are never hesitant about protesting vigorously to their Representative when they believe their rights are threatened. But I have not received from them any protests whatsoever concerning the census questions.

Probably the people of Denver realize that the confidential nature of their answers to the census questions will be guarded as inviolate. Doubtless also they have in mind that all enumerators and other census officials have been solemnly admonished to guard jealously the confidential nature of these communications, and that, by act of Congress, violation of such admonition is subject to heavy penalties.

The opinion of an eminent educator of Colorado, Mr. Robert G. Dunbar, assistant professor of history at the Colorado State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts at Fort Collins, Colo., is also significant. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert, at this point in the RECORD, a letter from him to me on this subject. Mr. Dunbar points out the statistical value of the information sought and that "similar questions have been asked in previous censuses—the seventh, eighth, and ninth—without serious consequences to the Bill of Rights and American democracy"; and that "the American farmer has answered questions of this nature for decades."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

COLORADO STATE COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE AND MECHANIC ARTS AND EXPERIMENT STATION, Fort Collins, Colo., March 13, 1940.

LAWRENCE LEWIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The newspapers report the attempt that is being made by some Members of Congress to delete from the Sixteenth Census the schedule concerning wages and salaries.

It would be unfortunate if such a deletion took place. It is true that the census could be taken without the schedule, as it has been before, but the addition of the information on the national income will make it much more valuable. No other information will give as good an index of the economic and social conditions of the Nation at the end of the critical fourth decade of the twentieth century; no other schedule will be more valuable to American legislators, sociologists, economists, and social historians. Similar questions have been asked in previous censuses (the seventh, eighth, and ninth) without serious consequences to the Bill of Rights and American democracy; in truth, the American farmer has answered questions of this nature for decades.

I therefore urge that you do everything possible to keep the schedule on wages and salaries within the Sixteenth Census.

Yours truly,

ROBERT G. DUNBAR,
Assistant Professor of History.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, 23 years ago the 6th of this month, this Nation made a declaration of war. One year before that date the people little thought that would be the course of affairs.

The world is now once again engaged in mortal conflict, and we have thus far escaped participation in it.

Our citizens are anxiously watching every act of the Nation's men in public life. The slightest rumor of approach to the brink of war causes them grave concern.

A recent speech of one of our foreign representatives has not added to our people's peace of mind.

White books, issued by foreign governments, even though we know them to be mere war propaganda, sends the whole Nation into a state of jitters.

It seems to me that now is the time for national leaders in all departments of the Government to reassure our people that it is our determination to remain at peace. As 23 years ago we declared war, we should, in commemoration of that day, now declare peace; that is, declare that it is our policy to remain at peace. Accordingly I have introduced into this House a concurrent resolution asking that next Saturday, April 6, be set aside for the proper observance of this day. The resolution provides for a joint session of the Senate and House. That to that session the President and his Cabinet and such others as is customary on such occasions be invited. It also provides that the President shall at that time address those assembled and the Nation at large on the subject of peace, stressing our determination to stay out of the conflict. I hope the Rules Committee will see fit to report the resolution. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a short editorial from the Fort Smith Times-Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I received word this morning from the W. P. A. Administrator that the quota in Montana would be cut down from 14,600 for the month of March to 12,025 for the month of April. This is going to bring an untold hardship upon our needy people. We have white people—men, women, and children—in Montana who are without work and in dire need. We have Indians who are now, and have been during the winter months, living in tents without sufficient clothing or food, and this reduction in relief is going to increase the acute distress condition. We seem to have money to take care of the needy in foreign nations, and my thought is that charity begins at home. I fully realize that looking after your own people and attending to your own business does not make headlines, but I want to say that we had better give more attention to the economic needs of our own people than we have been, or else we may not have to look 3,000 miles across the water for trouble. We are not menaced by any foreign nation in the world, but unemployment is stalking this country, and we had better take heed before it is too late. Therefore let us give our attention to home affairs.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article appearing in the April issue of the National Grange Monthly, which includes a statement by Louis J. Taber.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief editorial appearing in the Palladium Item, of Richmond, Ind., of March 28.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a short letter from W. W. Chapin, publisher of the California Argonaut, and to insert an editorial on the national block-booking bill from a nonpartisan standpoint.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I also ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, the thing that seems to concern the gentlemen on the right-hand side of the aisle is what they are going to do about relief, and then they say that we cannot look to industry to provide complete employment. I want to say to the Congress that if we had as much red blood in our veins to try to get up here and help the people of this country get jobs as we have to get them a dole, we would give them jobs by changing some of the laws that we have enacted here in the last 4 or 5 years and give industry an opportunity to go ahead and do something without being harassed by the National Labor Relations Board. This will do more to give jobs than any other one thing that we can do and will take people off the dole.

I believe it is time for us to give recognition to some of the things that are going to provide employment for people in private industry and take them off of the dole. This is what we want to do, and we can do it if we will only act wisely and judiciously.

If we were as interested in getting people jobs in industry as getting votes we would help those on the dole. We would help the country and probably this would not be called April-fool day. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have two unanimous-consent requests to make. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a quotation from the Gold Reserve Act, and I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include quotations from the Gold Reserve Act and from opinions of the Supreme Court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a short editorial from one of my papers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my request for time this afternoon at the close of the business of the day. I shall not desire to use the time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a radio address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and print in the RECORD a tribute by the United States Maritime Commission to the late Joseph R. Sheehan, former executive director of the Commission, and, at the time of his death, president of the American President Line.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

W. P. A. APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, it would be a violation of the rules of the House to question the accuracy of the statements made this morning by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], who spoke about the need for W. P. A. appropriations in their respective States. What I am wondering now is how their statements can be true—and I refer to the picture they painted as to the dire distress, the overpowering need for further relief appropriations, the millions of unemployed; how these things can be, after the more than 7 years of reform and recovery legislation which they have given us; after the expenditure of some $65,000,000,000; after the addition of more than $25,000,000,000 to the national debt—all expended under the prescription of the gentleman in the White House, who knew just what was wrong with us as a Nation; who knew the remedy which we needed to bring about a full recovery and who promised, if we would let him prescribe, that he would cure all our ills.

Is the picture which was painted by the gentlemen—the one from Missouri, the other from Montana—untrue? It seems not. Rather it appears that our doctor has been administering quack remedies and that, as a physician and curer of domestic ills, he is, by the results, shown to have been a failure. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on two subjects, Education and the United Mine Workers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an article by Mr. Carl H. Wilken, secretary of the Raw Materials National Council, on reciprocal-trade agreements.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNITED STATES FOREST SERVICE

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSFER OF UNITED STATES FOREST SERVICE TO DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR WOULD BE A MISTAKE

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, in a newspaper article on Saturday the statement was made that some 40,000,000 acres of land in the United States forests under the jurisdiction of the United States Forest Service would probably be transferred to another department of the Government. I call the attention of the Members of the House to what is being done under one of those acts of consolidation which was passed in the interest of economy last year. As far as I know—and I stand subject to correction if I am not correct—the only thing that has been done under those acts authorizing the executive branch of the Government to consolidate departments and transfer from one to the other has been a letterhead-paper proposition.

In other words, the Bureau of Fisheries, for example, is still the Bureau of Fisheries, but under the legislation passed in 1939 it has been transferred from the Department of Commerce to the Department of the Interior. There was no attempt at any economy, and there has been none. We just have a new letterhead reading "Department of the Interior" instead of "Department of Commerce."

This particular transfer may or may not be a good one. In fact, it may or may not be necessary. But it does show how tremendous power is centralized and placed in the hands of one man. Congress, which appropriates the money necessary for bureaus and commissions and departments, should never have surrendered its prerogative.

All of you will recall that in 1939 attempts were made to transfer the national forests, which are under the supervision of the United States Forest Service, to the Department of the Interior. There were so many protests that such a transfer at that time was reported to be abandoned. The United States Forest Service had done fine work, and no one had any valid reasons why it should be interrupted. After all, its primary purpose is forestry, not recreation.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I want to register a protest against this new proposal which was announced in the newspapers under date of March 30. Bear in mind that these reorganization proposals have now passed out of the hands of Congress and can be done by the President, and unless Congress takes affirmative action to disapprove his procedure it has the effect of a law.

This newspaper announcement indicates that about 40,000,000 acres of the forest land is to be transferred under another reorganization decree. In the district which I have the honor to represent there is the Superior National Forest. The United States Forest Service is doing splendid work in that district, and the sentiment of the people in that territory is not favorable to having the United States forests transferred to the Department of the Interior.

There is no greater conservation agency in the Government than the Forest Service, and its policies ought to be continued. We do not need a national park in northern Minnesota, and those who think otherwise are not familiar with conditions in that section.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an article from the Christian Century.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BUSINESS CONDITIONS

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, just because it is an opportunity to do so, I have asked for 1 minute to call attention again to the New York Times Business Index of yesterday. The business index is still going down like a rocket. I do not know that that will affect the State of Montana but I predict that business conditions are due for a much greater fall than is seen at present. I want the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR], who sits beside the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], on whom he must rely for funds this year, to some day tell why this condition seems now so constant in Montana, and whether he sees any hope ahead of conditions there being better.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It will take more than 7 years for this country to recover from the wreck left after the 12 long years preceding the 7 years.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is exactly what I thought the answer would be, and it is such an evasive answer that I would not take time to reply to it if afforded under my request.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

BUSINESS CONDITIONS AND FARM PRICES

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CURRENCY EXPANSION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the condition to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] referred evidently exists. Business is "on the skids." It is on its way down to a level with agriculture. You have had industry stilted up by the tariff and other advantages all out of line with agricultural prices, and it is on its way now down to a meeting point with agriculture.

This condition is going to continue until we have a reasonable, controlled expansion of the currency, until we take this gold out of the ground that we have buried in Kentucky and use it for the purposes for which it was intended, and that is the issuing of currency against it, remonetizing silver, and putting that currency and that silver into circulation and raising the price of farm commodities to their normal level. I repeat again you Republicans continue to criticize this administration, but not a man running for President on the Republican ticket, and very few Members who are offering themselves for reelection for the House or Senate will dare to offer the American people a solution of this monetary problem, that must be solved before we get out of this depression. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain editorials.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

WAPATO SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 54, YAKIMA COUNTY, WASH.

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 3824, to provide funds for cooperation with Wapato School District No. 54, Yakima County, Wash., for extension of public-school buildings to be available for Indian children of the Yakima Reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE TO MAKE ARRESTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5409, to authorize certain officers of the United States Indian Service to make arrests in certain cases, and for other purposes.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the period in line 12, page 2, and add the following: Provided, That such costs, for the purpose of any amendatory contracts affecting the construction charges of Arrowrock Dam that may be entered into as authorized by the act of August 4, 1939 (53 Stat. 1187), may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be treated as part of the construction charges of said dam, and as payable in the same manner as such charges.

MOUNT RUSHMORE NATIONAL MONUMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8357, to amend the Mount Rushmore Memorial Act of 1938.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman understand what the bill is and what it does?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. It is simply an authorization to provide an additional 160 acres to the 1,500 already set aside as the Mount Rushmore Park. The necessity for acquiring this additional ground is to preserve the natural beauty of the park and prevent the establishment of a lot of hot-dog stands and other undesirable things that might be set up along this approach.

Mr. RICH. We have already taken a great amount of territory for this Mount Rushmore Memorial.

Mr. KELLER. Not as much as needed.

Mr. RICH. It seems to me that we are getting bill after bill after bill to increase the size of national monuments. In the case of the Mount Rushmore Memorial the original purpose was that the Federal Government should spend $200,000 on the memorial. So far we have spent about $700,000, and more will be asked in proportion as the size of the monument is increased. No matter what we do there will always be someone else wanting to extend the boundaries. We must call a halt to it somewhere.

Mr. KELLER. This bill was accompanied by a unanimous report from the Committee on the Library. It was thoroughly considered.

Mr. RICH. I think the bill should go over until the next Consent Calendar day. We want to give it more study.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman will not look at it again, and he knows it.

Mr. RICH. I will look at it. When I say I will do a thing I will do it. I do not want the gentleman to make a statement like that. He should give some of his time to the Labor Committee and go down there and go to work, not criticize some other Member for what he may do.

Mr. KELLER. I spend as much time at the Labor Committee as the gentleman talks nonsense.

Mr. RICH. All the gentleman does is talk nonsense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Unanimous consent to consider the bill has already been granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that, but the bill had been submitted to the House and the consent of the House had been granted to consider the bill. The gentleman's request came on an amendment that was offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so recollect the facts. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] to submit the unanimous-consent request.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 40 of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "Panama Railroad Co." the following: "and all persons, other than independent contractors and their employees, employed on the Menominee Indian Reservation in the State of Wisconsin subsequent to September 7, 1916, in operations conducted pursuant to the act entitled 'An act to authorize the cutting of timber, the manufacure and sale of lumber, and the preservation of the forests on the Menominee Indian Reservation in the State of Wisconsin,' approved March 28, 1908, as amended, or any other act relating to tribal timber and logging operations on the Menominee Reservation."

SEC. 2. Any award heretofore made by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission under such act of September 7, 1916, to persons coming within the purview of the first section hereof, for disability or death resulting from a personal injury sustained prior to the enactment of this act, shall be valid, if such award would be valid if made in respect to an injury or death sustained after the enactment of this act. Any claim for disability or death to any person coming within the purview of the first section hereof, if such disability or death occurred prior to the enactment of this act, may be filed at any time within 1 year after the enactment hereof.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "act", strike out the remainder of the line and down through line 21 and insert the following: "Claim on account of disability or death of any person coming within the purview of the first section hereof, for benefits on account of injury incurred subsequent to July 28, 1935, may be filed under said act: Provided, That such claim be filed within 1 year after the approval hereof."

R. 7407, granting the consent of Congress to the General State Authority, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and/or the Pennsylvania Bridge and Tunnel Commission, either singly or jointly, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near the city of Millersburg, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know if this bridge is on a public highway and if that highway is built with Federal funds. I am constitutionally opposed to giving private concerns the right to build toll bridges on highways that are built in whole or in part with Federal funds. I have no objection to the State of Pennsylvania or any subdivision thereof building a free bridge, but I believe that it is a bad practice to turn these highways over to a few bridge companies so they may bottle up the highways and exact a toll from everybody who passes along the highways. I want to know if the gentleman is willing to agree to an amendment to strike out that provision with reference to the toll bridge.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not know whether or not the gentleman recalls it, but about 14 years ago I started in this House a single-handed fight against toll bridges constructed and promoted by private individuals. On the first roll call that I forced, my motion received 13 votes. However, I kept on and finally the House adopted a policy which the committee has been carrying out declining to let private interests build toll bridges. This particular bill involves the State, and there never has been any objection to a State or a subdivision of a State building a toll bridge. In the end they will become free bridges.

Mr. RANKIN. This bill reads "the State or." I do not believe the gentleman read this bill carefully.

Mr. COCHRAN. Or representatives of a State.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand, this does not refer to representatives of a State; it is a bridge company.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COSTELLO. The bill provides for the State Authority, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or the Pennsylvania Bridge and Tunnel Commission, either one of them separately, or jointly, to construct this bridge. This is a public organization, it is not a private organization.

Mr. RANKIN. It is the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Very well.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, may I say that if someone wishes to build a bridge and the people who use that bridge are willing to pay a toll so the bridge may be paid for and the Federal Government will not have to levy taxes to pay for it, it seems to me they should be allowed to do so. That is sound legislation and certainly good business. We have bridges at Harrisburg, Pa., and we have bridges on the other side above York, Pa., over the Susquehanna River. If the local people want to construct a bridge at Middletown and for some reason want to pay for it, why not let them do it? I am not interested in someone's trying to make any money out of it or to gouge the people. I want to serve them.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand.

Mr. RICH. But if the State authority looked after the matter and saw that those who built the bridge could not make more than 5 or 6 percent on their money, would it not be wise business procedure for us Members of Congress to follow to let the people who use the bridge pay for it? That seems sensible. That is good business. That is the logical thing to do. And it will not cost any person a penny who does not use it, and those who use it pay for service rendered.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if nobody was involved except the local people his contention might be correct, but if this bridge is on a transcontinental highway that is built with Federal funds, a highway the people of the whole country use, I am not willing to turn it over to a private bridge company.

Mr. RICH. I will guarantee that the State Highway Department of Pennsylvania is not going to let anybody build a toll bridge by which they will hoodwink and gouge the people of Pennsylvania. If the people are willing to pay the toll, then I believe we ought to let this bill go through and render a service without cost to the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the General State Authority, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and/or the Pennsylvania Bridge and Tunnel Commission, either singly or jointly, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Susquehanna River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Millersburg, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wonder if they could explain this bill?

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, there is no reason for any objection to the bill. If the gentleman had only noticed where the bridge is being constructed, he would not have asked the question.

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury, at the direction of the President, shall assemble annually a Coast Guard Personnel Board (hereinafter referred to as the Board), to be composed of not less than five commissioned officers of the rank of captain or above on the active list of the Coast Guard. It shall be the duty of the Board (a) to recommend for retirement such commissioned officers of the Coast Guard who have 30 or more years of service, as the Board determines, in its discretion, should be retired from active service, (b) to recommend for retirement such commissioned officers of the Coast Guard who have been placed out of line of promotion and who have 10 years or more of commissioned service, as the Board determines, in its discretion, should be retired from active service, and (c) to recommend for placing out of line of promotion such lieutenant commanders on the active list, as the Board determines, in its discretion, should be placed out of line of promotion. The proceedings, findings, and recommendations of the Board shall be transmitted to the Commandant of the Coast Guard for review. If the Commandant shall approve the recommendations of the Board, notification thereof shall be given by him in writing to each officer concerned, who, for the first time under this act, is recommended for retirement or for placing out of line of promotion; and any such officer who, within 30 days after receipt of such notification, files with the Commandant a written protest of the action taken by the Board in his case, shall not be retired involuntarily or placed out of line of promotion under this act unless a subsequent annual Board, none of the members of which were members of the previous Board which recommended such officer's retirement or placing out of line of promotion, determines, in its discretion, that such officer should be retired or placed out of line of promotion, and so recommends, in which case such officer may, upon approval by the President, be retired from active service with retired pay as prescribed by section 3 hereof, or be placed out of line of promotion, as the case may be, as hereinafter provided. At the expiration of 30 days after receipt by an officer of notice aforesaid, in the event that no such protest is filed by him, such officer may upon approval by the President, be retired from active service with retired pay as prescribed by section 3 hereof, or be placed out of line of promotion, as the case may be, as hereinafter provided. If the Commandant shall disapprove any recommendation of the Board, the officer concerned shall retain his status in the Coast Guard to the same extent as if his case had not been considered by such Board. Except as hereinbefore provided, each recommendation of the Board which is finally approved by the Commandant, together with the proceedings and findings of the Board, shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury for further review, and if the Secretary shall disapprove any recommendation of the Board, the officer concerned shall retain his status in the Coast Guard to the same extent as if his case had not been considered by such Board. Each recommendation of the Board which is not disapproved by the Secretary shall be laid before the President by the Secretary with his recommendation in the case. The President may, in any calendar year, pursuant to recommendations so laid before him—

"(a) Place out of line of promotion such number of lieutenant commanders on the active list as will not exceed the whole number nearest to 2 percent of the officers in that grade as of January 1 of such year; except that such limitation shall not be construed to limit the number of lieutenant commanders who may be placed out of line of promotion, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for failing to establish their mental, moral, and professional fitness for promotion.

"(b) Place upon the retired list such number of commissioned officers who have 30 or more years of service as will not exceed the whole number nearest to 5 percent of the number of officers falling within that classification on January 1 of such year.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION TO SPECIAL ASSISTANTS TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4366, to authorize the payment of additional compensation to special assistants to the Attorney General in the case of United States against Doheny executors.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice there is a minority report in connection with this bill signed by six members of the committee. It is very obvious when there is a minority report accompanying a bill that it is not going to be passed by unanimous consent. My only reason for asking that it be passed over without prejudice is that the committee might want to request that it be taken from the calendar because there is not any chance whatsoever of a bill with a minority report on it going through on the Consent Calendar, and for this reason I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "Secretary", strike out "may, in his discretion" and insert the word "shall."

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States of America is authorized to issue a proclamation calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all governmental buildings on October 11, 1940, and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day in schools and churches, or other suitable places, with appropriate ceremonies in commemoration of the death of Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

DEFINING CERTAIN MINING PRACTICES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8285) with reference to certain mining practices and defining unfair trade practices in certain instances.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I have prepared an amendment to this bill to make it general in character. In my opinion, the bill, as far as it goes, is a worthy bill and should be passed. I have taken the matter up with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PETERSON], who introduced the bill, and he suggests that it be amended; and I have prepared an amendment including all of the products and articles and the importation of articles produced on which there is a patent. Some time ago my attention was called to a magazine article in which there were photographs of infringements of patents held by citizens of the United States in foreign countries, and these are imported and come in competition with our products, and there seems to be no way now, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mineral case, by which the owner of the patent has any claim against the importer or anyone else. My amendment would make this general, to include all articles and products.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be deemed an unfair trade practice to import for use, sale, or exchange any minerals mined, produced, or processed by use of the flotation process except where such minerals are produced or mined under authority of the owner of such flotation process.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:
"That it shall be deemed an unfair trade practice and a violation of the right of the patentee to import for use, sale, or exchange any minerals mined, produced, or processed by use of any mining process covered by the claims of any outstanding United States letters patent heretofore or hereafter issued, except where such minerals are produced, processed, or mined under authority of the owner of such process."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following substitute for the committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT: Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute in lieu thereof the following:
"That it shall be deemed an unfair trade practice and in violation of the right of the patentee to import for use, sale, or exchange any article, mineral, or product produced, processed, or mined by use of any process covered by the claims of any outstanding United States letters patent, or to import for use, sale, or exchange any article, mineral, or product which infringes the right of any patentee under letters patent so issued, except where such articles are produced, processed, mined, or imported under authority of the owner of such process or patent."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan for the committee amendment.

The substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to limit the importation of articles, products, and minerals produced, processed, or mined under process covered by outstanding United States patents; to define unfair trade practices in certain instances, and for other purposes."

TOMAH INDIAN SCHOOL, WISCONSIN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7530, to transfer the site and buildings of the Tomah Indian School to the State of Wisconsin.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to transfer to the State of Wisconsin under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe all or any part of the land and buildings comprising the Tomah Indian School at Tomah, Wis.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:
"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the State of Wisconsin, upon such terms and in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon, for institutional or other public use, title to all or any part of the property known and designated as the Tomah Indian School located at Tomah, Wis."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

ANTIETAM BATTLEFIELD SITE

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1780, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire property for the Antietam Battlefield site in the State of Maryland, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like someone to explain this bill, and how much ground they want to add to this battlefield. I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice, Mr. Speaker

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

TRANSFER OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS IN CERTAIN CASES

AMENDING SUBSECTION (D) OF SECTION 4 OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS APPROVED MAY 26, 1924

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8753, to amend subsection (d) of section 4 of the act of Congress approved May 26, 1924, entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. VAN ZANDT and Mr. CLEVENGER objected.

Mrs. O'DAY. Will the gentleman reserve the objection?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Yes; I will reserve the objection.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, this bill gives to women the same privileges that foreign men, ministers, and professors have had ever since the immigration law was passed. Four hundred and seventeen men have come in under the nonquota law and have brought their wives and children. In that length of time 47 women professors have come in, and I know that most of them were spinsters. Now we want legislation to change that, to give women the same privilege as men.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. O'DAY], it is legislation of this type that provides an additional loophole in our immigration laws.

So that my colleagues may fully understand the far-reaching effect of section 4–D of the Immigration Act of 1924, I wish to call to your attention that since the act became effective in 1924 a total of 15,578 nonquota immigrant aliens, as ministers, professors, their wives, and unmarried children, were admitted to the United States.

For the further information of my colleagues, I am inserting herewith a break-down of the 15,578 nonquota immigrant aliens referred to above, showing pertinent facts compiled by the United States Immigration Service.

Nonquota immigrant aliens admitted since July 1, 1924, under sec. 4d of the Immigration Act of 1924, as ministers and professors and their wives and unmarried children; also ministers and professors admitted since 1932, by sex, as specified.[1]

[1] Statistics showing classes of admission under the act of 1924 by sex, not compiled prior to 1933.

The committee report on the measure now before us—H. R. 8753—states that in the last 5 years 46 female professors came into the United States nonquota. It is true under the existing law they are not permitted to bring their husbands or unmarried children under 18 years of age. To care for this group of husbands and unmarried children we are asked to approve H. R. 8753 as an amendment to the Immigration Act of 1924. If this amendment is approved not only will we take care of the husbands and unmarried children of the 46 female professors now in the United States, but another loophole will be provided in our immigration laws that will permit the influx of more aliens; thus further hampering the efforts of the American people to solve their own unemployment problem. The plight of 10,000,000 unemployed Americans is the real question before this Congress at the present moment.

This amendment vitally concerns this question of unemployment, whether it permits the admission of a dozen nonquota immigrants, or a thousand such persons. Therefore, I take the position, that this amendment rather than being assigned to the Consent Calendar of the House, where debate is denied, rightfully should come to this floor under a rule granting full debate and a thorough analysis of the effects of the amendment so that every Member of the House may have knowledge of the serious consequences to result from its enactment.

The problem of the 46 female professors may be solved by the introduction of a private bill in each instance, and the merits of the individual case considered.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I insist on my objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MORE ADEQUATE COMPENSATION FOR CERTAIN DEPENDENTS OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9000, to provide for more adequate compensation for certain dependents of World War veterans, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to be passed. It provides compensation for the widows and orphans of World War veterans; it is following precedents set by Congress for the dependents of veterans of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War. I hope the gentleman will allow this measure to go through.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that the bill provides for a possible annual cost of over $48,000,000. Of course, the committee, in making its estimate of the bill, presumed that only half of those who are eligible the first year will make application, and for that reason they cut the cost of the bill down to a possible $24,000,000. But the bill provides for benefits to widows and children without regard to the cause of the veteran's death, or requirement of the existence of a service-connected disability at the time of death. This bill provides for general pensions for all widows and dependents, whether they be children or parents, of all veterans who served for a period of 90 days and were honorably discharged. To my mind we are stepping out on a very vast program that may run into hundreds of millions of dollars annually. I think it would be a dangerous precedent for the Congress to establish by this act. Once the requirement of a service-connected disability is waived for the benefit of widows and dependents it will be only a short step to waiving the service-connection requirements for the veterans themselves. A veteran who has suffered no disability during his war service does not have a claim against the Government for compensation. Since the veteran does not have a claim, and after all, it was the veteran who went to war and not his dependents, then certainly the dependents cannot have a claim against the Government. This legislation is purely a gratuity that cannot be justified, but which will cost the Government possibly $48,000,000 the first year and an ever-increasing amount each year thereafter.

Mr. RANKIN. I was afraid the gentleman did not understand the proposition. This bill will not begin to cost $48,000,000 a year. It will not cost $25,000,000. The chances are it will take so many of these widows and orphans and dependents off of the relief rolls that it will not cost any more than we are paying now. In addition to that, this bill is even a limitation on the legislation governing compensation for widows and orphans of other wars, in that it only provides for compensation of those widows without children who married the veteran prior to July 3, 1921, the legal date of the closing of the World War. Many thousands of these widows with these little children are on relief; and I submit veterans' widows ought not be compelled to rear the veterans' orphan children on relief. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection and let this bill go through.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I simply asked that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. RANKIN. I think the gentleman ought to withdraw that. I will have to object to that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will state that the committee report shows that during the first year 30,500 widows alone, 66,700 widows with children, and 23,500 children are going to be affected by this legislation.

The committee giving its statement as to the possible costs, cutting their own figures in half stated that the bill would cost approximately $19,957,000, bringing on the rolls the dependents of approximately 60,300 deceased World War veterans.

Further as to the parents, it is estimated that the parents of approximately 32,800 deceased veterans would be entitled to compensation at a cost of approximately $8,472,000 the first year. Quoting the committee report, it states:

However, if it can be assumed that one-half of those that apply will be paid the first year, the cost for this group would approximate $4,236,000 bringing on the rolls the parents of approximately 16,400 deceased veterans.

The committee's own report taking their half figures states that this bill will cost approximately $24,000,000 the first year. If all the widows and dependents applied the next year, it would cost over $48,000,000; and every year veterans are dying off so as to continually increase the number. Their widows and dependent children and parents would be entitled under this legislation to come in and obtain a pension. You are giving a blanket pension to all dependents of veterans who served in the war regardless of whether the veteran had any disability. For the first time you are about to eliminate the requirement of service connection. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why we should single out that group of civilians who wore the uniform for a short period of time, suffered no disability, and then say to their widows and to their dependents, "You shall have a pension," but turn to all other civilians regardless of what disability they may incur in civilian life and say they shall have no compensation at all unless it be under the old-age pension acts. Why one small group should be so singled out and given pensions is far beyond me to understand, and I frankly state to this House that every piece of legislation of this kind that we pass is used simply as a springboard to dive farther into the Treasury pool in order to obtain further benefits.

If you pass this legislation, there is absolutely no question in my mind but what you are going to come in here next with a bill providing universal pensions for all veterans who served in the World War regardless of whether they suffered any disability; and, remember, over 4,000,000 veterans served in the World War. If we are going to grant universal pensions to those veterans, the cost is going to be not only prohibitive but it is going to plunge us into bankruptcy. The passage of such legislation as the pending bill is only a step toward far greater expenditures in spite of all the benefits which have already been conferred on the World War veterans. The gentleman from Mississippi states that he is only trying to do for the World War veterans what has been done for the veterans of other wars. Whenever this argument is made, the full facts and the complete picture are never presented. Instead, certain very astonishing facts and figures are seldom referred to or revealed. The long list of extra benefits which were extended to the World War veterans which the veterans of other wars did not get and which amount to so staggering a sum that it becomes well-nigh incredible, is a matter which is not mentioned.

For the benefit of the taxpayers of this country, who, in the long run, are called upon to finance the benefits disbursed by reason of such legislation as this, it will be interesting to review the cost of pensions and compensation which, since the year 1790 until June 30, 1939, totaled $13,702,692,413.96. The total expenditures for pensions of Civil War veterans through June 30, 1939, amounted to $8,006,533,061.14. The total expenditures for veterans' pensions and compensation does not take into consideration other benefits that were given to World War veterans. For example, under the war-risk policies, the Government has paid to the veterans $2,136,101,862.63, and the veterans contributed something over $454,000,000. It has been the belief of many American taxpayers that the World War veterans have paid for all the insurance they got, but this is not an accurate statement; they paid less than 25 percent of the cost of the war-risk insurance. The war-risk insurance should not be confused with Government life insurance, however, as this is self-sustaining.

During the World War, veterans who had dependents could allot $15 of their pay for such dependents, and the Government made an additional allowance in various amounts to their dependents. These allowances amounted to appropriations of over $1,580,000,000. The dependents of the Civil War and Spanish-American War were not honored by such gratuities.

In order to eliminate pensions for World War veterans, vocational training laws were enacted in 1918. Eligibility was determined for vocational training of 179,519 World War veterans. Of the total number of World War veterans benefited by this act, 128,747 satisfactorily completed the courses prescribed for them. The total cost of vocational training was $644,804,963.82.

After the World War period, the various veteran groups petitioned Congress for a cash bonus for World War veterans and as a result of their concentrated efforts over a period of years, the World War Adjusted Compensation Act was passed. This act, as you all know, provided that veterans would be given an adjusted service certificate which would become due in 20 years, with a loan value on the certificate which increased in value after the first 2 years. What happened to this law is history, as the veterans shortly after receiving their certificates demanded full payment of the certificates and 4,117,473 veterans and their dependents have been paid either by bonds or check a sum of $3,765,473,212.49. These certificates under the original act would not have become due until 1945 if the veteran filed for them in 1925.

Apparently every major program of the veteran organizations has been to provide certain benefits to their respective group, which would eliminate the possibility of veterans demanding pensions. As a result of this millions of dollars have been appropriated. For instance, the sum total of $200,044,766 was made available for construction purposes during the past 20 years, and as a result of this huge expenditure the Veterans' Administration is now operating hospital facilities at 84 locations in 45 States and the District of Columbia. These facilities have a bed capacity of 54,779, and when the program is completed the total bed capacity will be around 100,000. Since March 3, 1919, when the acquisition of Government facilities was first authorized for the treatment of veterans of the World War, there have been 2,028,865 admissions of United States veterans to hospitals, of which 165,776 were made during this year. Since June 7, 1924, when hospitalization was first authorized for veterans of all wars without regard to the origin of their disabilities, 1,206,966, or about 75 percent of the admissions, have been for treatment of disabilities not connected with service. Over 92 percent of the admissions last year were on account of non-service-connected disabilities. The granting of hospitalization to World War veterans for disabilities which are not service-connected is purely a gratuity at the expense of the taxpayers, and unlike service-connected disabilities cannot be justified as something to which the veteran is rightly entitled as compensation from his Government for service rendered. Of the United States veterans admitted to hospitals during last year 90 percent were World War veterans.

It was not long, however, after the World War Veterans' Act of June 7, 1924, which embraced new principles in the payment of compensation to veterans that far exceeded those of any previous group, that the Disability Allowance Act was passed. This law, as you know, provided pensions to World War veterans who did not have any disabilities attributable to their military service. The total cost of the Disability Allowance Act was $190,334,347.54, and on June 30, 1933, when these veterans were taken off the pension rolls due to the Economy Act there were 412,482 veterans in receipt of disability allowance. There are, however, remaining on the rolls 55,739 World War veterans receiving permanent total non-service-connected benefits. The annual value of awards for these veterans amounts to $18,092,688. In addition to this staggering sum there has been expended for compensation for World War veterans the sum in excess of over $3,000,000,000.

There has never been a country in the world's history that has been so generous and liberal with its veterans and their dependents, especially the World War veteran group. Regardless of the fact that World War veterans have received insurance benefits, their dependents have received allotment and allowance benefits, free hospitalization, adjusted compensation—bonus—disability allowance for non-service-connected disabilities, and liberal compensation benefits for service-connected disabilities that cost the taxpayers of this country over $11,000,000,000, which is more than two-thirds the benefits received by veterans other than the World War group, now we are faced with a pension drive by the World War veterans for widows and orphans of that war which will cost the taxpayers an additional $48,000,000 the first year, and which will increase annually by large amounts that will only be exceeded by the cost of future legislation when the World War veteran himself makes his demand for universal pensions in a sum that will definitely bankrupt the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

EXTENSION TO CERTAIN CIVILIANS OF PRIVILEGES OF THE SOLDIERS' HOMES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1008, to confer to certain persons who served in the Quartermaster Corps or under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster General during the War with Spain, the Philippine Insurrection, or the China relief expedition the benefits of hospitalization and the privileges of the soldiers' homes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from California, that those old people who would have been benefited by the passage of the last bill, as has just been explained in the Well of this House, are being thrown off of relief; they are being thrown off of W. P. A.; they are being thrown off without anything.

So far as concerns the creating of a precedent by the passage of such bill and its laying the groundwork for further legislation, no man has any right to make that kind of charge against it in this House. What we are trying to do is to hold this veterans' legislation down for these dependent widows, children, and parents. We are trying to hold it down the very best we can; and to broadcast a speech like that, attacking the veterans of this country and stating that it means a pension for all veterans of the World War, is nothing in God's world but propaganda that ought not to go into the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the bill under consideration has no relationship whatsoever to the previous bill, to whose consideration I objected. The pending bill has to do with the granting to certain civilians who served in the Quartermaster Corps or under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster General during the War with Spain, the Philippine Insurrection, or the China Relief Expedition, the benefits of hospitalization, and the privileges of the soldiers' homes.

In view of the fact that the report does not contain any statement from any one of the three departments of Government that are concerned I feel that this legislation is not entitled to the consideration of the House at this time. It is my understanding that the War Department is opposed to the legislation in view of the fact that it provides that civilians may be placed in the Washington Soldier's Home, an institution maintained by funds derived from deductions from the pay of soldiers serving in the military forces of the country. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

ENFORCEMENT LAWS PROHIBITING THE IMPORTATION OF PIRATICAL COPIES OF WORKS COPYRIGHTED IN THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2689, to amend section 33 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 33 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 33. That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General are hereby empowered and required to make and enforce individually or jointly such rules and regulations as shall prevent the importation into the United States of articles prohibited importation by this act, and may require, as conditions precedent to exclusion of any work in which copyright is claimed, the copyright proprietor or any person claiming actual or potential injury by reason of actual or contemplated importations of copies of such work to file with the Post Office Department or the Treasury Department a certificate of the Register of Copyrights that the provisions of section 12 of this act, as amended, have been fully complied with, and to give notice of such compliance to postmasters or to customs officers at the ports of entry in the United States in such form and accompanied by such exhibits as may be deemed necessary for the practical and efficient administration and enforcement of the provisions of sections 30 and 31 of this act."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PURCHASE OF CERTAIN LANDS FOR SAN CARLOS INDIANS (ARIZONA)

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6796, to authorize the purchase of certain lands for the San Carlos Apache Tribe, Arizona.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to ask the author of this bill a question. The cost of this property is estimated to be $19,134 for the land for this Indian tribe. Who is going to purchase this land?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, the land will be purchased by the Indian Bureau and that price is approximate because an agreement has not been entered into. About 600 acres of land will be purchased out of funds already appropriated or to be appropriated later to the San Carlos Indians of the San Carlos Indian Reservation. I do not know whether it could be taken out of the Indian funds or whether it must be out of funds appropriated for the Indians.

Mr. RICH. Does this Indian tribe have any funds in the Treasury?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I think they have.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I do not know how much they have, but whatever it is, this purchase price should not be taken out of it.

Mr. RICH. I think the gentleman better get that information before action is taken on this bill. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill has been O. K.'d by the Indian Bureau and endorsed by two government agencies of Arizona. We are trying to buy 600 acres of land to add to the San Carlos Indian Reservation. About 130 or 140 acres are tillable when under irrigation. This is another effort to make these Indians more nearly self-supporting. If they may have some farm land on which to raise grass, they will become self-sufficient, as they are expert stockmen. This purchase will facilitate the economic management of the San Carlos Reservation.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate all that, and I know that the Indian Bureau is interested. We say we are trying to make the Indians self-supporting; but if notice is taken of the legislation we have passed in the last 4 or 5 years in support of Indians, the amount of appropriation each year is becoming greater and greater. It is supposed that the number of Indians is becoming less and less, but the cost of maintaining them is increasing. Every member of the Interior Department Appropriation Committee that has charge of the allocation of funds to the Indian Bureau knows this to be the case. I would like to know whether these funds are going to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States or out of the Indian tribe funds for the land. We ought to know that definitely before we decide on the passage of the bill. I think it should go over until the gentleman can get the information we are asking for.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]?

There was no objection.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS ADJACENT TO SAN JUAN NATIONAL FOREST, COLO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8356, for the exchange of lands adjacent to the San Juan National Forest and the Rio Grande National Forest in Colorado.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. L. 465; U. S. C., title 16, sec. 485), entitled "An act to consolidate national forest lands," and the provisions of the act of February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. L. p. 1090; U. S. C., title 16, sec. 486), entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to consolidate national forest lands,'" and acts amendatory thereto, are hereby extended to include any suitable offered lands within the boundaries of that portion of the former Mexican grant known as the Tierra Amarilla Grant, lying within the State of Colorado, adjacent to the Rio Grande or San Juan National Forests. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the national forest nearest to which they are situated, and shall thereafter be subject to the laws, rules, and regulations applicable to said national forest.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMISSION TO CITIZENSHIP OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 575, to consider the bill H. R. 6381, for the admission to citizenship of aliens who came into this country prior to February 5, 1917.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI]?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill provides for the admission to citizenship of aliens who came to this country prior to February 5. Will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. LESINSKI. This bill provides that the people who are legally in this country, and who have entered prior to 1917, being in the main old people and unable to speak the language fully and correctly, may be allowed to become citizens without going through all the tests that are necessary now. In other words, they are not allowed citizenship unless they can read and write the English language.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

TRANSFER OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 610 and the consideration of the bill H. R. 9047, to provide for the transfer of United States prisoners in certain cases.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any person confined in any penal or correctional institution pursuant to a judgment of conviction of an offense against the United States has been indicted or convicted of a felony in a court of record of any State, other than the State in which such person is confined, the Attorney General shall, if he finds it in the public interest to do so, upon the request of the Governor or the executive authority of such State, and upon the presentation of a certified copy of such indictment or judgment of conviction, cause such person to be transferred prior to his release to a penal or correctional institution situated within such State that is authorized to receive United States prisoners. In the event more than one such request is presented in respect to any prisoner, the Attorney General shall determine in his discretion which request should receive preference. The expense of personnel and transportation incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be chargeable to the appropriation for the "support of United States prisoners."

SEC. 2. The term "indictment" as used in this act shall include "information" and the term "indicted" shall include "informed against." The term "State" shall include the District of Columbia, but not Territories.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall be deemed to limit the authority of the Attorney General to transfer any prisoners pursuant to any other provision of law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed at this point in the RECORD, and include a proclamation of the Governor of Texas and also a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, a number of Members have asked me about H. R. 9047 on today's Consent Calendar, which was introduced by me, and have wanted to know the reasons and necessity therefor. This I am glad to explain.

H. R. 9047 is entitled "A bill to provide for the transfer of United States prisoners in certain cases." Since this bill is short and since the reading of the bill, I think, will enable one to understand its purpose and import, I quote the bill just here in full:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any person confined in any penal or correctional institution pursuant to a judgment of conviction of an offense against the United States has been indicted or convicted of a felony in a court of record of any State, other than the State in which such person is confined, the Attorney General shall, if he finds it in the public interest to do so, upon the request of the Governor or the executive authority of such State, and upon the presentation of a certified copy of such indictment or judgment of conviction, cause such person to be transferred prior to his release to a penal or correctional institution situated within such State that is authorized to receive United States prisoners. In the event more than one such request is presented in respect to any prisoner, the Attorney General shall determine in his discretion which request should receive preference. The expense of personnel and transportation incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be chargeable to the appropriation for the "Support of United States prisoners."

SEC. 2. The term "indictment" as used in this act shall include "information," and the term "indicted" shall include "informed against." The term "State" shall include the District of Columbia, but not Territories.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall be deemed to limit the authority of the Attorney General to transfer any prisoners pursuant to any other provision of law.

The purpose and workings of the bill might be further illustrated by brief reference to a case prosecuted by me while I was district attorney of the forty-sixth judicial district of Texas. In January of 1934 it was my unpleasant duty to prosecute a former sheriff and tax collector of Foard County, Tex. This sheriff was sent to the Texas penitentiary under convictions in three separate cases, two convictions carried penalties of 3 years each while a third carried a penalty of 7 years. On January 14, 1935, this ex-sheriff received a conditional pardon on his 7-year sentence, but not on his 3-year sentences, commitment papers on which had not been filed at the State penitentiary at Huntsville, Tex. Immediately on receipt of this conditional pardon said ex-sheriff went to New Orleans, La., and surrendered to Federal officers to begin the service of a sentence of 1 year and 1 day for conspiracy and counterfeiting, and on January 30, 1935, was committed to the United States penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga. On July 2, 1935, the aforesaid conditional pardon was revoked by the then Governor of Texas, the Honorable James V. Allred. The revocation proclamation of Governor Allred contains a further statement of facts, and the proclamation is here quoted in full:

PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF TEXAS

To All To Whom These Presents Shall Come:

Whereas Que R. Miller, convict No. 75520, was convicted in the district court of Hardeman County, Tex., in January 1934, of misapplication of public funds, and sentenced to 7 (2–7) years' confinement in the State penitentiary; and was, on the 14th day of January 1935, granted a conditional pardon by the then Governor in proclamation No. 27386; and

Whereas I have, as Governor, been requested to revoke the conditional pardon granted Que R. Miller in proclamation No. 27386. It has been represented to me by Hon. Ed L. Gossett, district attorney in and for the forty-sixth judicial district of Texas, as follows: "Said Miller in the procurement of said pardon perpetrated a fraud upon the Governor in failing to disclose: (1) That at the time said pardon was granted he was under final conviction for the misapplication of public funds in Foard County, Tex., the commitment papers for which were not then of record in the State penitentiary; (2) That at such time there was then pending (and is still pending) in the district court of Wilbarger County, Tex., an indictment against the said Miller for the misapplication of public funds; (3) That the said Miller had admitted the misapplication and conversion of public money while sheriff and tax collector of Foard County exceeding $40,000; (4) That said Miller had been indicted in Foard County, Tex., in cause No. 516 on the docket of the district court for the fraudulent disposition of mortgaged property, which case had been dismissed after he had gone to the penitentiary; (5) That there had been filed on the 10th day of January 1935, and was then pending (and is still pending) in the district court of Johnson County, Tex., in cause No. 14994, an indictment against the said Que R. Miller for felony theft; (6) That on the 10th day of December 1933, in the district court of Jackson County, Okla., said Miller had been indicted for the offense of robbery with firearms under the alias of George Waggoner, said Waggoner and Miller being the same persons, which indictment is now pending; (7) That at the time such conditional pardon was granted that said Miller had pending against him in the district court of Shawnee, Okla., an indictment for robbing one Evans of $2,000, and was under $10,000 bond in such cause, which cause is still pending; (8) That the records of the Western Union office at Vernon then revealed that said Miller had received in nine telegraphic messages over $38,000 from the tax collector of Wilbarger County, Tex., such wires dating from October 1931 to May 1932, and that the tax collector of Wilbarger County had admitted such money to have been public funds and such tax collector went to the Texas penitentiary for such misapplication but the said Miller was never indicted for this offense, it being the opinion of prosecuting officials that he would have to do the 7 years assessed him in Hardeman County, Tex.; (9) That at such time said Miller had pled guilty in the Federal court of New Orleans to the possession of counterfeit money for which crime he is now serving in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., his time expiring on November 12, 1935. Furthermore, since the granting of said conditional pardon, said Miller has been twice indicted by the grand jury of Wilbarger County, Tex. The grand jury for the March term, 1935, indicted said Miller for the swindle of one B. A. Winter out of a diamond ring of the alleged value of $1,000; the grand jury for the June term, 1935, indicted the said Miller for the swindling of one F. M. Johnson out of $200, said swindle occurring on or about January 15, 1935, at the very time of or after said conditional pardon was granted." Because the said Que R. Miller has been twice indicted for felonies since the granting of the conditional pardon to him in proclamation No. 27386, because there is now pending against him in four different district courts at least six felony indictments, and because of the fraudulent representations and nondisclosures, and because Miller's entire record proves him to be a dangerous enemy of society, this request for a revocation of the conditional pardon granted the convict has been asked. The conditional pardon granted the said Que R. Miller stated that it was subject to revocation "for any good and sufficient reason" of the Governor's justifying his so doing * * * "with or without hearing * * *." Acting upon and because of the recommendation stated above: Now, therefore,

I, James V. Allred, Governor of the State of Texas, by virtue of the authority vested in me under the constitution and laws of this State, upon the recommendations hereinabove cited and for the reasons herein set out and now on file in the office of the Secretary of State, do hereby revoke the conditional pardon granted to Que R. Miller in proclamation No. 27386 by the then Governor on the 14th day of January 1935. The said conditional pardon is hereby set aside and declared void. The prison authorities are hereby instructed to take him in charge immediately upon his release from the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., and return him to the penitentiary to serve the remainder of his term.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto signed my name officially and caused the seal of State to be impressed hereon at Austin, this the 2d day of July, A. D., 1935.

[SEAL]

JAMES V. ALLRED,
Governor of Texas.

By the Governor:

GERALD C. MANN,
Secretary of State.

On the expiration of said ex-sheriff's term in the United States prison at Atlanta, on request from Texas officials, upon warrants from Texas courts, said Miller was taken into custody by the sheriff of Fulton County, Ga.

Gov. Eugene Talmadge, of Georgia, refused to surrender said ex-sheriff to Texas officers. Notwithstanding three unserved sentences in the Texas penitentiary, notwithstanding the numerous felony indictments pending in Texas against the said Que R. Miller, Governor Talmadge refused Governor Allred's request for Miller's return and gave his reasons therefor in the following letter to Governor Allred:

DECEMBER 20, 1935.

Hon. JAMES V. ALLRED,
Governor of Texas, Austin, Tex.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: The requisition for the extradition of Q. R. Miller, was presented to me today, and after going into the matter thoroughly, I have declined to grant the extradition.

It appears that Miller was given a conditional pardon by the Governor of Texas on January 14, 1935, that he immediately surrendered himself to the Federal authorities and was sent to the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., and served a sentence of which he had been previously convicted.

He has completed the service of this sentence at the Federal penitentiary in Atlanta, Ga., and the request for his extradition is based on the fact that his conditional pardon was revoked on July 2, 1935.

It is apparent on its face that this man has not had an opportunity to commit a crime or to violate his conditional pardon, due to the fact that he has been incarcerated in the Federal penitentiary since it was granted.

Sworn testimony was given showing that the information given by the district attorney in his petition to you for revocation of the conditional pardon was on file with Governor Ferguson when she granted the conditional pardon. This being true, I cannot see how Miller could be guilty of fraud in securing his conditional pardon.

In view of these facts which appear on the face of this case, and from sworn testimony, I think the extradition should be denied, and have given the matter that direction.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

EUGENE TALMADGE, Governor.

Had H. R. 9047 been the law in 1935, Federal officers would have placed said Miller in a Federal prison in Texas prior to his release. Miller would have been released in his home State of Texas at little or no additional expense and there would have been no confusion or miscarriage of justice. H. R. 9047 is designed to plug this big hole in our defense against crime and to provide for better cooperation by the Federal Government with the States in the matter of law enforcement.

The SPEAKER. This concludes the consideration of bills on the Consent Calendar.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein comments by Senator MCNARY, Senator BARKLEY, and others.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks, including a letter from a member of the Oklahoma Legislature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of March 25, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], in an extension of his remarks, made an attack on the Governor and Legislature of Oklahoma.

Mr. Speaker, I rise because I want to do what little I can to destroy prejudice wherever it may raise its vicious head.

In his remarks unfounded assertion has been the gentleman's chief resort. There was a time when slander fulminated from the platform smote like a sword, but the supply having greatly exceeded the demand, political slander and misrepresentation has at last become almost innocent amusement.

Arguments cannot be answered by personal abuse. There is no logic in slander. Falsehood in the end defeats itself. The gentleman does not offer facts, he makes assertions. He does not say, "I think." He says, "I know." He does not appeal to reason, he calls on prejudice. It is amazing to me that a difference of opinion on a condition that he knows nothing with certainty about should lead the gentleman from Mississippi to accuse, persecute, and hate people he does not know. Does he denounce and slander every person who thinks for himself? Does he hold that every thought contrary to his own is conceived in falsehood and brought forth in fraud?

Slander has been used as a weapon for centuries against those who exercise the right to think for themselves. It is the same old hoot, hooted by screech owls for a thousand years. There is little democracy until there is mental grandeur enough to allow every man to have his thought and say without impugning his motives and slandering his actions. Is it now so that no two men can differ and still respect each other's motives and integrity? Is thought to become a slave and reason a trembling coward? Is independence a crime? Has cowardice become a virtue? In my opinion every mind should think, investigate, and conclude for itself the road to take. Every man should repel dictation and tyranny from whatever source it should come.

Particularly, the gentleman said:

A large number of influential members of that body (the State legislature), who occupy key positions, are on the pay rolls of the oil interests, coal interests, or power interests.

In addition to his malicious attack on the Governor of Oklahoma, the gentleman has seen fit to indict and condemn the State legislature. If the gentleman from Mississippi has any specific information of any wrong activity or any guilt on the part of any of these people whom he condemns, I am sure that the people of Oklahoma would like to have specific information, if the gentleman can base it upon substantiating facts. If he has no facts, he ought to say so. If his statements are based on hearsay, they are immediately open to suspicion.

Like the Congress of the United States, the Legislature of Oklahoma is an elected body, made up by and large, I am sure, of men of integrity. The gentleman's remarks about the Legislature of Oklahoma indicate with what amazing ingenuity a fragment of truth can be magnified, twisted, and distorted out of language.

I am not addressing myself to the right or wrong of any particular action of the Governor or the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma. I do not follow the details of their activities closely enough to pass judgment. I devote my time to trying to do a good job here. So far as my relations with the Governor and the members of the Legislature of Oklahoma are concerned, they attend to their affairs and I attend to mine. I do not meddle in State affairs, but I resent, for the State of Oklahoma, this false accusation against the elected officials of my State.

The charge that any great number of influential members of the State Legislature of Oklahoma are on the pay roll of special interests is unreasonable, untrue, and malicious. I hold these charges in infinite contempt.

I do not believe the gentleman ever set foot in Oklahoma or ever spent a day in Oklahoma in his life, so how can be know the facts involved? I can assure the gentleman that Oklahoma is filled with men of character and intelligence. Men and women capable of governing themselves without assistance from the gentleman from Mississippi.

The State of Mississippi, with all of its fine and splendid people, is not free from suffering and want, and I expect that in the State of Mississippi industry is crippled, labor is robbed, and the poor are burdened with taxation. While we realize that the gentleman's mental hemorrhage in which he slandered the Governor and Legislature of Oklahoma was born out of a feeling of knight errantry, we feel that his knighthood would best be in flower championing the cause of labor in Mississippi, promoting the health and welfare of the farmers of Mississippi and abolishing the specter of hunger, want, and insecurity from within the boundaries of his State.

I do not assert that every action of the Governor and Legislature of Oklahoma has been in every way correct. I have no doubt but that there have been errors of judgment. I am certain that in the main the Oklahoma Legislature is filled with men of wisdom, integrity, and good character.

I have no information which would lead me to pass judgment on the action of the Governor of Oklahoma at the Grand River Dam, so I do not approve or condemn it. I feel that those questions are up to the people of Oklahoma and not for me to decide, and certainly not to be settled by the gentleman from Mississippi.

It is an unpleasant and unwanted duty to come in conflict with a colleague, but the gentleman's broad indictment is unjust and unfair. He has not supported with evidence and fact a single assertion that he has made.

Representing my district with the concurrent broader responsibilities has absorbed all of my time, and so I repeat, in conclusion, that I have had neither the time nor the inclination even to observe closely the activities of the Governors or the legislatures of the various States. I do not try to decide what they should do with the problems which they must face and meet. I have enough to do to decide what should be done with problems we must meet and solve here. I would not presume to try to tell the Governor or Legislature of Oklahoma or of any other State what to do, just as I would not permit them to tell me what to do in any given circumstance.

Mr. Speaker, I do not rise here to defend the action of the Governor or any particular member of the Oklahoma Legislature in any particular circumstance or matter, but I do defend the Governor of Oklahoma as a man of character and the legislature of my State as a body of honorable men. The finest thing about a democracy is that every action is its own defense and lives only the length of its value. If an action is right it will live and grow forever. If it is wrong it will break down of its own weight and die in its own error. Mr. Speaker, I arose to denounce and condemn an unjust and unwarranted attack upon my State and the elected officials of my State.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
March 29, 1940.

Hon. LYLE H. BOREN, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have noticed in the newspapers that an attack has been made upon the Governor of our State in regard to his partiality to utilities and also as to his record when a member of the house of representatives. I feel that this is a reflection upon the record that I have written as a member of the house of representatives. Certainly it behooves me to protect my record and that of the Governor also.

For your information and that of the gentlemen who made this attack, I have gone through all the legislative journals since 1933, the beginning of Governor Phillips' career in public office, and have checked the recorded votes affecting utilities. Not one time do I find where he has cast a vote in support of legislation favoring the utilities and public-service corporations of this State.

It might be well to here set out and enumerate the bills that were introduced and passed by the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth sessions of the Oklahoma Legislature, of which Governor Phillips was a member. Beginning with the fourteenth legislature in 1933, Governor Phillips voted "aye" on house bill No. 1, which was an act levying a tax upon the net incomes of utilities and public-service corporations. I find that he voted "aye" on house bill No. 225, which levied a tax upon freight rates against railroads. He voted "aye" on house bill No. 650, levying a corporation license tax. He was the author of house bill No. 675, which proposed to create a revolving fund of $100,000 to investigate and assemble facts in regard to the public utilities' rate—this fund to be collected from the utilities doing business in this State.

During the fifteenth session of the Oklahoma Legislature, in 1935, Phillips was speaker of the house of representatives. He changed the basic rates of income tax which vitally affected the utilities of this State. The old law provided for a 2-percent to 5-percent tax on a graduated scale. He passed the bill, broadening it from 1 percent to 6 percent, which nearly doubled the tax on utilities. House bill No. 87, known as the gross production tax bill, passed the house in that session, increasing the gross-production tax from 3 percent to 8 percent. That more than doubled the tax. During the fifteenth session Phillips initiated a program and set up a balanced budget, which this State had not enjoyed for 8 years previous. It also created a surplus of about $1,000,000. Nobody else can take credit for that except our Governor.

In the sixteenth legislature, beginning in 1937, Governor Phillips voted for and supported a bill which created the Grand River Dam authority. He also voted for the passage of house bill No. 94, which limited the length of trains. The railroads put on a lobby during that session attempting to defeat this bill which has never been surpassed. House bill No. 349, charging a franchise tax on public utilities that operated in this State, was passed by Governor Phillips' untiring efforts.

During his administration as Governor he has done away with the ports of entry, which were a trade barrier limiting the trucking industry from competition and giving the people a disadvantage in freight rates in the State of Oklahoma with surrounding States.

As Governor he ordered his attorneys in the tax commission to collect a use tax against the Stanolind Pipe Line Co. and the Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. These companies had paid this tax and later filed a suit in the Federal courts to recover the amount of revenue that they had paid in. This case has been heard and decided in favor of the companies and, upon the Governor's instructions, appealed to the circuit court of appeals and is set for oral argument on April 16 of this year.

All during his tenure in public office not one place can I find a bill showing favoritism to the utilities. I had the pleasure of serving 4 years in the house of representatives with Governor Phillips. I served in the last session, under his administration, as a representative from Lincoln County. I am rather proud of the record I have made and I am more than proud of the record that Governor Phillips has made in the past and is making at the present time as Governor of this Commonwealth.

Certainly, bearing in mind Governor Phillips' legislative record and his record as our chief executive, no one familiar with these facts could charge him with favoring utilities or public-service corporations.

I have made a thorough check of his record and I am giving it to you to do with as you please. You may use it to enlighten others who have made these accusations or to acquaint yourself with his record.

Sincerely yours,

LESTER D. HOYT,
State Representative, Lincoln County.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHEPPARD). Under a previous special order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, we are confronted today with a critical situation, to which reference has already been made in the House this afternoon, but it can hardly be understood except against the background of the general economic problem which we face.

I take it that all of us are eager to solve the unemployment problem. But we do not want just to solve the unemployment problem. We want to do more than that. We want to solve the unemployment problem within the framework of a free economic system and with the preservation of our constitutional democracy as a form of government. This presents us with a more difficult task than might otherwise be the case. That task is worth doing with all our might, for the future of human liberty depends upon our accomplishing it.

The problem in a nutshell is largely a matter of 2 plus 2 having to equal 4. Industry and agriculture turn out goods each year of a certain value and price. The total selling price of all these goods is equal to the realized income of the people of the United States, but unless that income is promptly either spent on consumers' goods or invested in new capital goods you have a shortage of buying power, and a part of those goods cannot be sold.

Under these circumstances one of three things must happen: Either Congress without resort to public debt has to exercise its constitutional prerogative and actually create money and place it into circulation through the hands of people who will spend it promptly to an amount sufficient to compensate for that shortage of buying power, or else it must do things which will directly stimulate the prompt investment of idle savings, or else Government must in some manner itself spend sufficient funds to compensate for the shortage of buying power relative to the value of goods and services produced. The last method is the one used over the past 7 years. But it has been used intermittently and at times on an insufficient scale to bring the desired results. And once the money has been spent we have had no adequate means of keeping it in active circulation.

Unless these things are done and if investment is not promptly made of that section of realized income which goes into the hands of the people who normally will save or invest it, then you have unemployment and depression.

OUR CONDITION TODAY IS WHOLLY DIFFERENT FROM THAT OF THE TWENTIES

I know that in what I am going to say here today I shall be confronted before I get through with someone saying, "Why not go back to what we did in the twenties? We seemed to get along all right in those days. Why not go back and follow along that same policy?" I am going to answer that at this time before I get started on the rest of my remarks.

In the first place, we did not get along all right in the twenties. The reason we did not get along all right was because all through the twenties we were laying the groundwork for the most terrible depression in all the history of this country; namely, the depression of 1929. The collapse of that year was caused by maladjustments which had been accumulating all through the previous 9 years.

The second point is that during the twenties you had four different things that were taking place which constituted avenues of compensation for the failure of savings to go promptly into investment. The first of these was a net increase in the debts of local governments; that is, States and municipalities, of about $1,000,000,000 a year. This money was mostly spent on local public improvements and public works. This net expansion of local-government debt, totaling about $9,000,000,000 during the twenties up to 1929, continued until approximately the year 1933, when it started to level off. The debt of local public bodies is now slightly on the decline.

In the second place, the consumers of America had accumulated a total consumers' indebtedness by 1929 of somewhere between $9,000,000,000 and $11,000,000,000. They owed that much for goods bought on the installment plan; that is, they had attempted to purchase some $11,000,000,000 more of goods and services than they had the income to pay for, and had taken those goods off the shelves but never, in fact, were able to pay for them.

In the next place, a lot of foreign bonds were sold, which means there was a lot of money loaned to foreign countries, money that never was paid back but which for the time being constituted a market for goods. In other words, America was able to work like the very devil in order to create a lot of valuable goods to send abroad and not get paid for them, but it did create employment temporarily and a distribution of buying power.

Now, let me show you a couple of charts. I hold in my hand a chart of family dwelling construction. This is 1932, and this is 1939. It shows a steady increase during those years. Look at the difference, however, between the twenties and the thirties. There is where a lot of money now in idle savings went in the twenties. This is the value of building construction, telling the same story. I could go on and show you other examples of the same thing.

We are not in a period comparable to the twenties, Mr. Speaker; we are in a new period which is marked more than anything else by one characteristic; namely, a sharp increase in the output and efficiency per worker both in agriculture and in industry. We can produce more with fewer people employed. But we cannot continue to produce unless pretty much everyone is able to consume his share of national output. We are under the absolute necessity of seeing to it that the standard of living of the American Nation rises in proportion to its power to produce wealth. For good or ill, and I would say on the whole for good, we are not at the moment making a lot of foreign loans, not in anything like the volume they were being made in the twenties.

We cannot simply stop all our governmental efforts and turn this thing loose, because there just simply is not room for enough investment to absorb the funds which now seek investment. Our distribution of income is so heavily weighted in favor of the top one-third of our population that they cannot find places to invest promptly the 20 percent of the total national income which, in a year like 1937, they will save. We save about 20 percent or at any rate 15 percent of our national income. On the basis of a national income of even $80,000,000,000 we would have to find investment opportunity for about $19,000,000,000, and it just cannot be done. We just do not need $19,000,000,000 of new capital goods each year. That amount of money is half the value of all the factories in America. There has got to be more money in the stream of consumer buying power and less in the pools of idle savings in order to enable the remainder of investment funds to be promptly put to work.

Every time a new machine is invented, moreover, we need an additional volume of consumer buying power in circulation to match this increased production. At present we depend on an increase in either public or private debt to get this expansion of our money supply. We should not be in that position when our Nation's power to produce increases; then is the time when our money supply should be increased by direct action of Congress creating that money. We should not, as a Nation, go into debt to the banking system when we need a net addition to consumer buying power to match an increase in production. But to get back to our comparison of the present day with the 1920's.

State and local debt has stopped increasing, and consumers on the whole are not able to expand their debt as they did during the twenties. We find ourselves, therefore, in the position where, unless some other salutary measures are taken, such as a program of taxes and pensions to our older citizens which would, in effect, shift a portion of funds that now seek investment over into active consumer buying power—in the absence of taking that step, in the absence of establishing a truly scientific monetary system which would bring money into circulation in accordance with national needs and not in accordance with purely fortuitous circumstances of a group of people being willing to borrow at interest from the banking system, and the banks being likewise ready to lend, in the absence of taking some of these steps, in the absence of making a constructive use of some of the gold and silver resources that now lie idle in the Federal Treasury as a credit base for a public-works program which might be run on the basis of as little as 1 percent interest, in the absence of doing those things, we are confronted with the necessity that the Federal Government has got to compensate for the failure of investment to be promptly made or else you go deeper into depression, and unemployment continues.

Since last December 1939 the Federal Reserve index of production has declined from 128 points to 104 for the month of March. The rate of decline is just about as sharp as it was in the latter part of 1937.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It has been suggested that we must resort again to increasing our imports and commence to lend again to foreign nations to bring us out of the condition we are in. What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The gentleman has this to say about it. I am in favor of foreign trade as a means of mutual benefit to two nations, one of which can produce certain commodities and the other other commodities so that there is benefit by mutual interchange of needed goods. But I believe it is a confession of failure on our own part when we find it necessary to rely upon shipping valuable commodities out of our country in order to distribute wages to our own people because of those exports instead of being able to bring about a better standard of living for our own people here at home. And I would remind the gentleman of the very remarkable speech made by Mr. Milo Perkins, in Des Moines, Iowa, in which he pointed out that so far as the farmers of America are concerned, their greatest possibility of an expanded market lies in enabling the poorest two-thirds of the American people to buy the food they really need.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to say that the gentleman is making a very splendid, convincing, and elaborate argument and I agree with every word he says, but the gentleman would oppose, would he not, the further lending of money to foreign countries until we have put our own country on its feet?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact, though, that the gentleman would welcome loans to foreign countries that are good loans, properly secured, if they are secured and the gentleman feels reasonably certain they would be paid back. That kind of foreign trade the gentleman would be in favor of.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is quite a different matter, I will say to the gentleman.

I would like to proceed now, if I may for a few moments without interruption, because I want to get on with my statement.

YEARS 1937 AND 1940 COMPARED

In the year 1937, the Congress was confronted by a decision very similar to the one that it confronts today. In the closing months of 1936 we found an increase in employment. Here is a chart that shows it. Here is 1933, and employment went up through about the middle of 1937 and got above 100, which was the average for 1923 to 1925. At that point we said, "Ah, now we must balance the Budget. Now we almost have gotten the best of this thing, so now is the time to quit." This short-sighted policy, together with another factor that came into the picture at that time—the Social Security Act—caused a sharp decline. I think I can explain that better by saying that manufacturers and producers of goods ordinarily accumulate a certain quantity of inventory. If their inventory becomes a considerable one and if they must look forward to a sharp curtailment of mass buying power on the part of the people, they just let those inventories run off, shut down their plants, and curtail employment. They do not do this to be mean; they do it because they have to. Therefore, when in 1937 it became apparent that not only was it contemplated that W. P. A. employment would be sharply curtailed, but that P. W. A. was to be shut down, and also that there would be a serious deflationary influence from the operation of the Social Security Act, you then had a sharp decline in employment in private industry in 1937. Now, if you will observe the curve at the end of this chart, you will find that the same tendency is indicated for the beginning of 1940, and indeed, between December 1939 and February 1940, employment did decline, according to the Department of Labor, by 1,160,000, part of which, of course, was a seasonal decline. Our main job, however, is to halt that decline now. We can do it.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman remember another factor that he did not mention—the time the curve started down and the country went into a tail spin? Just before that the reserve requirements of the banks were doubled, which was the same as plowing under three or four billion dollars. It was lost.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes; and I think also at that time there were other policies that might have been pursued with good effect by the Federal Reserve Board, that were not used. I would point out generally that inflation can never take place so long as increases in monetary supply or velocity are matched by corresponding increases in the production of goods and services.

As far as inventories at the moment are concerned, we find the manufacturing inventories in February at 110.5, compared to 100 for December 1938, and 12 points higher than last June. Wholesale inventories in February were at 118 points, compared to December 1938. If businessmen must look ahead to the Federal Government firing 1,400,000 W. P. A. workers between now and October—I will explain that statement later on—do you think they would maintain these inventories or would they let them run off and cut down production and lay off men? Anybody who can think about it will know. As a matter of fact, since December there has been a net decline in private employment of over 1,000,000 men. I do not know exactly how many, but some people estimate it at a million and a half. Orders on file have declined. Here is a chart that shows that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. These charts are mostly for heavy-goods industries. I will yield in a moment. We have no P. W. A. program in operation at the moment, though we ought to have, and my speech today would be different if we did have one. We could have one without any particular burden, without 1 cent of burden on the Budget. We could have a program offering loans at 1 percent to public bodies for public works—for schools, hospitals, and the like. We could have that if the Federal Government stopped hoarding some $4,000,000,000 of money, which it is not using today. There is $1,600,000,000 of idle silver seignorage in the Treasury. There is the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund, of which only $200,000,000 has ever been used. Assuming that $500,000,000 were left in the stabilization fund, that is a total of $3,100,000,000 which might readily be used as a credit base. In addition, there is $280,000,000 of completely idle gold, to say nothing of the Government gold against which the Federal Reserve banks have been given gold-certificate credits, and a working balance of over a billion dollars in the Treasury. It seems to me that we might make use of some of the monetary resources. The people have paid for them; why not use them for the people's benefit?

I would not be speaking as I am today except that we have failed to pass legislation that would have given us a monetary system readily responsive to the Nation's needs; we have gone along with a seriously deflationary social-security program, seeking to build up a huge reserve instead of passing a national pension system that would operate on a pay-as-you-go basis, paying out promptly all the tax money it takes in.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman brought out an interesting point the other day, and I hope that he develops it more fully now, as to how much of this money in the Treasury could be used. There is a general fund and a stabilization fund, and I believe it was shown that there were about $3,000,000,000 hoarded in the Treasury that could be used now for W. P. A. or anything else of that kind.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think it is at least that much. There is $1,642,000,000, approximately, of silver seignorage against which there has been no currency issued, and in the stabilization fund there is a total of $2,000,000,000, of which only $200,000,000 has ever been used. A billion and a half might readily be used for constructive purposes. There is also nearly $300,000,000, I believe, of completely free gold, and, as the gentleman suggests, a very large working balance of, I believe, over $1,000,000,000.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Does not the gentleman think it is better to restore prosperity to our own people than to stabilize the currency of foreign countries?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I do; and at this present moment we might have a long-range program of public works, that might be set up on a basis of approved projects, which might be available at the time of unemployment, so that men could be put to work when necessary, so that we would have it on a stable basis. We have the monetary reserve to do that. That is only one part of the answer I would like to make to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. The program we are following is extremely deflationary.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. It is, in my opinion.

Mr. RANKIN. We are borrowing money from the rich and giving it to the poor, for the rest of the American people to give back with compound interest. That not only kills initiative, but it also depresses prices. We demonetize silver and demonetize gold. We have our gold buried in the ground and our silver almost in the same condition. If we would remonetize both gold and silver on a ratio of something like 15 or 16 to 1 and issue currency against this gold and put it in circulation, it would remonetize silver all over the world and start foreign nations which are not at war to trading with us. That would restore farm commodity prices almost overnight and would break this deadlock. Then men would find their own jobs. They would go back to their own farms and their own homes and not be seeking the relief rolls. Until we do that, we might as well understand that we are going to be in this log jam that we are in today, and public spending will continue.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi very much. Now, speaking of deflationary influences, I would just like to point out—I know the reasons for it and why it is done and everything else, but the fact remains that in the current year of 1940 the social-security system will tax away from the people $1,200,000,000 more than will be paid out in benefits. That is for the purpose of building up a reserve; but the point is that unless that $1,200,000,000 is compensated for some way by additional spending on the part of the Government, which amount must, under our present monetary system, be borrowed, then you have got into a deflationary influence there that is most serious from the standpoint of our need for a proper balance between the consumer buying power and the power to produce. That is the reason why I believe, frankly, we should have a national system of pensions based upon the kind of taxes that will reduce the total volume of now idle money.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman develop the unemployment-insurance taxation? Would you have another system of raising the money for that?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I would raise the benefits first of all. But the difficulty is that only the States can take that action. I personally believe, also, that there is too much money being set aside for administration. I cannot understand why 10 percent is necessary, but I am a layman on that and I do not know for certain about that, and perhaps I should not say anything about it. But in general I would say that the benefits from unemployment insurance should be raised. That is a State matter, however.

Mr. PATMAN. I mean the taxes; the tax to raise that money. Would you adopt another method for raising the money or would you continue the one we have now?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think the tax on pay rolls for unemployment insurance, as well as old-age insurance, is essentially a deflationary tax. As a matter of fact, we are taxing pay rolls and spending the money on general Government expenses. Sound tax policy would indicate an opposite system.

Mr. PATMAN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. But on unemployment insurance I would say this, in general: I think that at the moment the most important thing would be for the States to raise the benefits, because many a man is worse off because he gets it than if he did not get it, because it makes him ineligible for other work programs. We cannot correct that, but the States can correct it.

On the matter of old-age pensions, we should have a different form of taxation, and one which would meet this central problem I am talking about, namely, the unbalance between consumer buying power, on the one hand, and production on the other—the inability of our people to buy what can so easily be produced.

W. P. A. ONLY AGENCY NOW AVAILABLE

One agency remains today which we can use to do the immediate job of starting employment on the upward road again. Here is the chart of industrial production for 1937 and for 1940. In both years a drop in employment shows the same proposition—sloughing off there and sloughing off here. We have one agency that can be used to check this tendency before it becomes serious, as it did in 1937, and that is the W. P. A. Yet here is what we plan to do.

I come to you with a brief today not only for those W. P. A. families, hundreds of whom I know, who are good people, people who only want to keep their kids in school, who only want to work for a living instead of being on relief or the dole. People talk about this being a dole program. It is not a dole program. It is an opportunity for people to earn a living instead of being put on the dole. I come to you not only with a brief for that group of people, but with a brief for the whole economic system of this country at this moment. I come to you with an appeal to keep these people working in order to stiffen consumer demand. If we wait longer, we will be hearing speeches about how "hunger is not debatable," and we will be passing an emergency bill to feed people when it is too late, and it will cost us a lot more money after we get through than if we act now.

In 1937 we waited, and in 1938 we came in with something like a $4,000,000,000 program. The time to cut these programs is when these people actually go back to work in private industry and not when somebody thinks maybe they are going to go back. How many of us know what this schedule of cuts on W. P. A. contemplates? It contemplates the following: 200,000 off in April; 300,000 off in May; 200,000 off in June. That is the end of this fiscal year. Seven hundred thousand heads of families to be laid off at a time when private employment is declining and not increasing.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT FISCAL YEAR

We must put people to work, for private industry is not taking up the slack. If we are to have a sound program, we had better increase those rolls and not cut them down. At least we must keep them where they are. And now let us look ahead. The figure of the Budget for next year, $1,000,000,000 for W. P. A. next year, would employ only 1,350,000 as against an average of 2,000,000 for this year. It means an average cut of 650,000.

Now, unless we keep up the employment for the balance of this year, there will be only a million and a half employed at the end of this coming June, and if the $1,000,000,000 Budget figure for next year is not changed, W. P. A. will have to cut another 600,000 or 700,000 off between June 30 and the trough of employment in the late summer in order to have any expansion of the rolls possible in the coming winter. What we are really contemplating, unless this picture is changed by Congress, is a reduction of the W. P. A. employees by 1,400,000 between now and the end of the summer. We cannot do this thing, Mr. Speaker.

WHERE WILL THE MONEY COME FROM?

Certainly the least we can do is to prevent the laying off of one single person between now and the end of the fiscal year. To do this will cost $86,800,000. That is all it will cost us, but where are we going to get the money? I will tell you about that.

Mr. RANKIN. I would get the money.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. RANKIN. I would issue it against this gold.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I thank the gentleman for the contribution, and I am not in disagreement with him, I will say that; but I want to show that there is more than one way of doing it and no excuse for not doing it. I will tell you various ways it could be done. I have already introduced a bill to do it. It would be this. There are some industries that have benefited very greatly from the war situation—a few, not very many, but a few. Agriculture has been hurt, fruit and vegetables have been hurt, tobacco has been hurt, even wheat has been hurt, and other peacetime industries. I think it is fair for us to levy a special tax on war excess profits in order that the burden of raising this revenue should be better distributed as between those who benefit from wartime profits and those who are hurt by war. That bill would provide some relief. In other words, I just want to say that I am not afraid to take my medicine on the tax side of this thing if it is necessary.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Very briefly, but I have not much time left.

Mr. PATRICK. Would it not be tremendously difficult, if not almost impossible, to determine who was hurt and who was not hurt, between ordinary profits and excess profits?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Not if we would follow this bill and say we would take normal profits as profits made in a base period of 4 or 5 years. A base period would be fixed in which normal profits would be determined. The tax would not apply say to any profits below 5 percent, 6 percent, or 7 percent, in any case, and it would fall only on the increase over and above normal profits of corporations. Another way of getting the money, however, is this hoarded money in the Treasury that we spoke about awhile ago. Another way is that current tax revenues according to the best estimate that we can get hold of are going to run about $400,000,000 ahead of the original estimates. The $86,000,000 required to carry the W. P. A. rolls along at their present strength would be less than one-quarter of the estimated increase of revenue derived from income-tax sources and from customs. No; if Congress permits these lay-offs, it cannot give the excuse that it did not have the money.

Over a period of time we have run on the basis of employing about 25 percent of the unemployed on W. P. A. I read in the morning's paper that the A. F. of L. estimates the unemployed at the present time at about 10,500,000, if my memory serves me correctly. According to the basis that we have followed in the past, that would mean over 2,500,000 people on W. P. A. As a matter of fact, we have about 2,300,000. And we are planning to cut it down to 900,000 before next fall.

WE NEED A CONSISTENT POLICY

I think I have made my position abundantly clear. I want to look at this thing fundamentally. I do not want the Congress to continually find itself in a position where it must suddenly decide that we have got to expand W. P. A., or having done so for a period, then to decide again all of a sudden that we have got to cut it down. What I am anxious to do is to get to the bottom of the fundamental problem, the fundamental reasons why we have this unemployment problem and try to work in a way that will result in a well-reasoned program that will be a permanent answer to it.

So I do not believe that any of us, regardless of what his political opinion may be, can afford to lay off these 1,400,000 American heads of families. I do not think we would be doing a fair thing by the businessmen, by the farmers, by those W. P. A. workers, by any other workers, or anybody else; and I ask you, therefore, to maintain these rolls where they are now for the balance of this fiscal year. Meanwhile we must find out once for all what is the real cause of unemployment, how we should act on taxes, old-age pensions, agriculture, public works, and many other matters to help solve it. Let us analyze the effect of the social-security program and see how different would be the effect of a national pension system paying out as it took in and operating to shift money out of idle pools into active consumers' hands. Let us think through this central problem of money and exchange and see whether it is not after all reasonable to say that if we have so-called surplus-farm commodities already piled up and several million people who need to eat them, that after all it would be right, it would be just, and it would be fair, particularly since those farm commodities sell today for a price below what is fair and below what is parity, to use the constitutional right of Congress to put sufficient money into circulation to enable those farm commodities to be moved. Such an expansive policy to be followed until such time and only until such time as farm prices are restored to a parity basis.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman given any consideration to the local responsibility that ought to be assumed in the administration of the W. P. A.? I have in mind that in many of the States throughout the country the Federal Government ratio of expenditure for direct relief runs from 95 to 99 percent of the total cost. I have further in mind the fact that in many, many States of the Union they spend less money for direct relief even than some cities in my own State. What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I will say in the first place that what the gentleman says does not hold true in my State.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is true.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. We have perhaps taken care over a period of time of approximately as many employable unemployed through State funds as were on W. P. A. There are other States where this has not been done, but I am told that if the rate of taxation in general in the State of Ohio, for example, were as high as the rate of taxation in the State of Mississippi, the State of Ohio could raise four times the revenue that it is raising now. What I mean is this: One reason why some of the States do not pay more is because there is not the wealth to tax. For my part I believe that for the welfare of the United States as a whole, and certainly for the welfare of my own State, one of the biggest jobs is to get a better spread of prosperity throughout this Nation.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman thinks that in a State where there is no income tax there is an inability to pay? Does he believe where there is widespread real-estate exemptions there is an inability to pay? Does he believe where industrial conditions have consistently improved during the last 10 years there is an inability to pay?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Not necessarily.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That exists in many States of the Union.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The gentleman may be right.

And now in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recite just a bit of history.

In 1937, on May 20, I said this in the House:

> The President has stated the thing most necessary for continued recovery and betterment is consumer purchasing power. I predict that if this Congress appropriates a billion or a billion and a half dollars, either one, but fails to appropriate more than either of these figures, we will be laying the ground work for the next depression. Not a penny less than $2,200,000,000 must be appropriated to keep W. P. A. employment where it is now, and if you want money for P. W. A., the amount ought to be $2,500,000,000.

We did not appropriate $2,200,000,000. We appropriated $1,500,000,000, and a few months later the recession began.

This year, on January 24, I said in the House:

> No. I am frank to say that I believe that, under present circumstances, unless some of the things are done which I am going to talk about right now, it is necessary to keep up employment of our people—on public works, if necessary—to at least the degree it was last year. I would keep every young person in America busy. Therefore I do not agree with the Budget. I think it is altogether possible that if we make these drastic cuts we will have another decline like we did in 1937, with the consequent necessity of spending more money in the end than if at this moment we seized unemployment by the scruff of the neck and said: "We are going to do the job that has to be done. We are going to actually put to work American people who are not at work."

I have asked this time to repeat that warning.

If you do not like W. P. A. let us find a better method of dealing with this problem. I have said and I believe there are better methods.

But until those other methods are actually in operation we have no right to deny a minimum of life and decency to 1,400,000 American families in the next few months—no right to cut W. P. A. employment from 2,300,000 to 900,000 in about 7 short months. And that is what the present schedule calls for.

Either you must join with us in our conference on unemployment and help the 70 members who are working through it to develop the fundamental answer to unemployment or else—ladies and gentlemen of the House—you must change that schedule and find the money to provide more jobs for these unemployed people who have already over a 10-year period paid a very very heavy price for the failure of us here in Washington to solve the unemployment problem more quickly.

America has never lost a battle yet. She is not going to lose this one now. There will arise, I firmly believe, a new consecration among us, a new devotion to duty and to our country and to every last person in it. The difference between right and wrong will become more clear and here and there throughout the land will arise men of vision who will begin to say with conviction, "This way is the will of God for America."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include certain excerpts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution adopted by the Wisconsin Association of Real Estate Brokers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAWKS]?

There was no objection.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all indebted to the gentleman from California for his efforts to produce a solution for our problem of unemployment, as, indeed, we are to everyone else in the House of Representatives who is working on this problem. I am sure we all recognize it as the gravest problem which confronts the Nation today—a problem the magnitude of which makes it necessary that we get down to hard and fast fundamental facts and devise some common-sense method of coping with this problem.

We have had it with us now for some 10 years, and it is now time that we should be able to profit by the experience we have had—collect our many ideas together, dispense with all hysteria and sentimentalism, and get down and work out some practical solution. When I think of the billions of dollars we have spent in the last 7 or 8 years on W. P. A., and think that all of this money has left almost nothing permanent behind it, I feel very much discouraged. When I make this statement I mean that we have spent all this money and indulged in all of this expenditure, but we have not devised any system whatsoever to make those who are unemployed or on W. P. A. any more able to care for themselves than they were before we spent this money. Very little of it has been spent for any real, permanent good.

Mr. Speaker, if we are going to solve the problem of unemployment, we must solve it in some manner that does not fasten the unemployed on the public pay roll for their existence. We cannot forever continue to take money from those who have and give it to those who have not. Soon we will have only the have-nots. I believe we must go into the homes of the unemployed in the United States and make an estimate of the capabilities to be found there. We will find there a certain percentage of unemployed people who came from the farms. Certainly some means should be devised to return those people to a piece of land whereby they will be enabled to raise at least a part of their livelihood in the way of food. I recognize quite well that it is impossible to do this with all of the unemployed. Many people have said they should all be put back on the farms, but such a blanket movement would be no solution. There are a certain number of these unemployed who originally came from farms, and they can get along on the farms if they are put back there. They can raise enough to eat, or at least a good portion of what they will need to eat. The money used to put them back there would not be money thrown away. It would have a permanent and beneficial effect. On the other hand, there is a certain class of these people who, if put back on the farm, would have to have a high-priced expert with every family to prevent them from starving to death on the farm. Obviously, their return to the farm would be poor economy, and some other solution must be worked out in their case. To start with those who came from the farm would be a step in the right direction.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I am deeply interested in what the gentleman says, and I am with him. I wonder if he would include a reclamation program as a part of the thing he is suggesting, and I wonder what he would think about our approaching this problem of soil conservation in perhaps a more vigorous way than we have, with the possibility of enabling some of these people to go to work on soil conservation in some sections of the country with a view to improving the land that they might themselves go onto.

Mr. FADDIS. In answer to the gentleman's question, I would be willing to go along on a proposition of that kind if it were undertaken on a hard and fast common-sense basis and not from the viewpoint of putting these people indefinitely on the public pay rolls, working around with soil until they wore it out. In other words, if the program would include putting them on a piece of land where they could raise their own living in the meantime, and then, in order to give them extra cash for clothing, amusement, and incidentals, let them work on soil conservation, all right; but if the program was purely a matter of putting these people on the public pay roll to work at soil conservation, no. That would be worse than the present program.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I believe the gentleman is right. May I ask one more question? I should like to know what the gentleman's opinion is of the Wheeler-Jones farm credit bill in this connection, and what his opinion is of the bill of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PETERSON] relating to farm homesteads?

Mr. FADDIS. That would be almost too much to answer at the present time, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am in thorough sympathy with what the gentleman is saying. I have felt for some time—as a matter of fact, for the last 5 or 6 years—that if we had taken the money we have spent without bringing about any permanent benefits and had acquired farms around the centers of population, dividing the farms into 5-acre tracts, where the people could keep a cow, maybe a pig or two, and a few chickens, and raise some potatoes, and be partially self-sustaining, they could always get part-time labor in the towns. It happens that I come from a community where we have a large granite industry, and that is part-time work. The men are not employed the year around. If these granite cutters lived on such 5-acre tracts, with what they earn in the granite sheds and the quarries they would be living on top of the world and, as far as they are concerned, relief would be solved for all eternity.

Mr. FADDIS. I agree with the distinguished gentleman, and that is exactly what I should like to see started. For instance, let me use a personal illustration in saying that you can put some of these people back on the farm and others you cannot. Take myself, for instance. I was raised on a farm. If I had to go back to the farm and the cow got hidebound I would know what was the matter with her. If the chickens got the roup, I would know what to do. If the cutworms were after the corn, I would know what was the matter and have an idea of what to do. But there are other people who, if you would put them on a piece of land of that kind, would be utterly and helplessly lost. You would have to provide entirely too much assistance to people of that kind to enable them to get along well on a piece of land to make the matter practical. Therefore, before any system of that kind could be put into effect, it would be necessary to make a thorough inventory of the unemployed and classify them in order to determine just where you could put them so they could help themselves.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I notice in discussing the relief problem here on the floor that many Members labor under the impression that everybody would go back on the farm. I know people who would rather live in town on half rations than go out and work on a farm at full rations, because their inclination is not that way. However, if you would locate them on the outskirts of a town, where they could walk in and see a movie in the evening, or perhaps visit with friends in town, they would not feel that they were isolated far out in the country. This is a very important angle that is often overlooked. We are not all alike. Many of us would not like to go out on a farm, and would not be happy out there. They would feel they were cut off from everything. Yet they would be thoroughly happy on a small tract of land which they could work by hand in the evenings and in their spare time.

Mr. FADDIS. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota that he is talking back in the "tallow candle" days. We now have rural electrification. We are taking cheap electricity out to the farmers of this country, and providing them with every convenience that you have in the towns without the noise and the taxes and other adverse influences from which they would like to get away. Consequently, there are more people moving back to the farm now. The inclination to move back to the farm or out to the rural sections is today stronger than it has ever been in the history of the country.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one brief observation?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say to the gentleman from Mississippi that there are a great many people who, if you took them away from the noise, would feel they were out of everything. They would miss it.

Mr. RANKIN. We take them the noise over the radio.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] in his address a moment ago made the statement that the total national income either had to be spent on consumers' goods or invested in capital goods, or the amount withheld measured the amount of goods not purchased, which resulted in ultimate unemployment. Is not our problem here to determine why vast sums are not being invested in capital goods?

Mr. FADDIS. That is true. Capital goods are the goods that really create the employment with which we wish to take up the slack.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Exactly; and these superficial panaceas, such as pump priming, will never get to the root of the evil.

Mr. FADDIS. That is true, and if the gentleman will permit, right in line with his remarks I may say that I am satisfied that we in the Congress of the United States must get down to a proper understanding of the fundamentals which govern our economic relations, both foreign and domestic, if we are ever to solve our pressing problems. We must give less attention to details and be moved more by reason than by hysteria. If we master the fundamental principles governing our economic life, such details as unemployment will take care of themselves. They are the result of the lack of understanding of fundamentals.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I simply want to observe that the gentleman was reassured, was he not, that rural electrification had taken care of farm problems.

Mr. FADDIS. Of course, we all understand the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is very enthusiastic about rural electrification, and sometimes I wonder if his enthusiasm in that respect does not equal the enthusiasm of the ultra visionaries who wish to solve this problem by putting everyone who is unemployed on the public pay roll. But, Mr. Speaker, if we are to solve this problem we must do as I stated before; we must make a thorough analysis of the capabilities of those who are unemployed. Those whose capabilities would permit them to be returned to a piece of land whereby they could earn part of their living should be returned to a piece of land. We must also return those who have capabilities along other lines to some form of employment whereby they can take care of themselves, at least part of the time. We must work out some program which will take the unemployed from the dole and the W. P. A. and make them self-supporting citizens. I realize, and everyone else, I am sure, realizes, that when we undertake to put such a program as this into effect, we are going to run into objections from the organized farmers, and if we attempt to put some of these people into a sort of semiprivate industry whereby they can support themselves, we are going to run into trouble with organized labor.

So there will be two stumbling blocks in the road of any program of this kind, but if it is to be solved, if the unemployed are to be taken off of the backs of the taxpayers of the United States, as they must be eventually, or the financial structure of this Nation will collapse, we will have to sit down and work out a program which will be mutually beneficial and agreeable to the taxpayers of the United States, to the farmers, and to the groups of organized labor of this Nation.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HAWKS. Then will it not be one of the primary objects of Members of Congress to keep in mind the welfare of all of the people of the country rather than to run to cover every time one of these pressure groups starts working on us?

Mr. FADDIS. That is exactly true; and I believe right now that pressure groups are the most dangerous foes of democracy. They work only for their own selfish interests. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GIFFORD. I just want to say that the gentleman is sound and he has my deep sympathy because, as you know, you only have 20 on this side of the House who think the way you do. The gentleman understands that, does he not?

Mr. FADDIS. I know there are a great many on this side of the House that I could wish thought as I do. Perhaps, I am wrong, but I have always believed I am right.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I just want to say that so far as I am personally concerned, what I said here today is not the result of any activities of any pressure group at all, but simply represents my own thinking on the subject.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. HAWKS. I did not mean my statement as any reflection on the gentleman from California, because I have always felt he is speaking his own mind. I have never agreed with him on most of his philosophies; in fact, I am absolutely opposed to them, but there was no personal reflection upon the gentleman in the statement I made.

Mr. FADDIS. I am sure the gentleman from Wisconsin expresses the belief of every Member of the House in that respect. No one doubts the sincerity of the gentleman from California.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I plead today for less hysteria, less sentimentalism, and less selfishness in this question of unemployment. It is our primary national problem. It has been amply proven by 7 years' experience that it is permanent, not temporary, and must therefore have a permanent and not a temporary solution. Our experience has proven that W. P. A. is only a makeshift and no solution. We must get together and work it out on a common-sense basis, by making it possible for everyone to be self-supporting by means of the only method the world ever knew—production. We must work it out with the idea in mind of helping both the unemployed and the employed. We must work it out along the ideas of Americanism and not in response of the wishes of any or all of the many pressure groups in this Nation. We must function as statesmen, and when we do so we will find the answer. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanmous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objecton to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objecton.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, the American people are determined now more than ever to abide by the wise advice given the Nation in the days of its infancy by its first President, the immortal George Washington. He warned us to beware of foreign alliances and entanglements. The present Congress is in complete agreement with that principle. I find an overwhelming sentiment against foreign involvements and alliances. I know I speak the sentiment of the vast majority of the Members of Congress when I say that the maintenance of peace is the cornerstone of our national policy. Unless called on to defend our country, this Nation will remain at peace. We are agreed that we will not enter into the quarrels of other nations. Yet we are all of one mind, that we will defend our shores, our lives, our liberties against foreign invasion.

We will not invite trouble to our land, but trouble may come without our making. Finland made every honorable attempt by peaceful means to avoid attack, but the Communist army marched against her. Poland was content to live within its borders at peace with the world, yet from the east and from the west it found itself invaded and crushed by the dictatorships—its liberties gone, its citizens condemned to lives of serfdom, its religion prostituted and destroyed. Czechoslovakia, a nation peopled by a proud and noble race, a nation desiring and asking nothing more than the opportunity to live its life in peaceful industry, found itself, too, taken over by a dictatorship.

We are living in a chaotic world. Who knows what the trend of events in Europe may be? Who can say the Communists will be content with their conquest of Finland and Poland? Without our people realizing what has been going on, the "red" dictator has been at work in our midst these many years. The Communist Party, professing Americanism, but accepting its orders and instructions from Moscow, has been boring from within. The Communists have entered the teaching role in our schools and colleges. Diligently the "red" agitator has been spreading his teachings of class hatred and strife.

In the words of a distinguished religious leader and citizen of Baltimore, the purpose of communism is not to keep the poor contented and happy but to create discontentment and to keep it steadily growing. The worst possible thing in the world for Communists is contentment. They breed on discontent.

The time has come in America for Americans to awake to what is going on about them. We who love freedom of opportunity, religious liberty, and political rights must realize that within and without there stand powerful forces that would destroy our American institutions. Little do some of us realize the insidious foreign influences and propaganda that are active all about us.

Everything that we have been taught from infancy to hold dear is held up to scorn, ridicule, and hatred. The family and the home, the Communist would destroy. Were the Soviet to succeed from without, or triumph by a successful revolution from within, Christianity would be banished from American life. The religions of our fathers—Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish—would meet the fate religion has met in Soviet Russia. The churches would be turned into halls for riotous living. The holy men and women of religious vocations would be violated and butchered.

Ours is the duty to make it plain to the foreign agitator that there is no place in America for him. If he does not like the American way, let him return to the place he came from. The foreign agitator can be curbed only if our people will exercise the eternal vigilance which is always the price of liberty.

To guard against the dangers from without is the task of the President and Congress. I am happy to say that Congress is alive to its obligations. It realizes that the surest guaranty of security for America is an America adequately prepared to defend its liberties. No foreign nation will be likely to attack us if it realizes we are prepared to ward off attack.

Modern warfare is not a mere matter of calling up a citizens' army. It is not a matter of a month or two of preparation. Adequate defense means first a navy equal to any other navy in the world. I am happy to say the President and Congress have done and are doing nobly to create such a navy, one that in a short time will be the pride and joy and the security of every American.

Likewise, the army of modern warfare requires long training, an efficient officer personnel, modern equipment in tanks, guns, and shells. Such an army cannot spring into being overnight. Therefore, I am happy to tell you that the President and Congress are alive to the needs of the Army.

There is no hysterical preparation for war. Hysteria and scare, the Congress has carefully avoided. But it has set in motion the machinery that will give us the nucleus for a sufficient Army if we are called upon to defend ourselves.

The American air force a short time back was far inferior in numbers and equipment to the air forces of other nations. Here, too, we have realized our shortcoming. With great vigor we are creating an air force worthy of the greatness of America. Shortly our air force will be large enough to beat off any force that might be sent against us.

Adequate defense is the watchword. Let us build to the point required for our safety and security. For adequate defense we must build and build promptly.

The scientists, it has been said, measure space by the distances of stars; the dictators measure distances on this globe by the range of their bombing planes. Though America is determined to remain neutral and at peace with the world, it cannot close its eyes to what is going on about it. The only neutral that can feel safe in its desire for peace is the neutral that is ready and able to defend itself. The only plea for peace that the war-mad dictators will respect is a peace backed with battle for battle, bomber for bomber, tank for tank, gun for gun. This is the kind of preparedness that the American people are entitled to have. This is the kind of preparedness the President and Congress are now undertaking to provide for our peace-loving nation. It is our surest bulwark against war. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I also listened with great interest to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] who spoke a few moments ago. I rose once to question him, but saw that he had been so interrupted that he had too little time. I am taking just a moment now to express my firm belief that he is fundamentally right in the views he expressed. I might disagree with him in some detail, but not to any great extent. As I understood the gentleman from California, we cannot long continue to borrow from the rich to feed the poor, although his heart and mine are in sympathy with the mass of the poor who must be taken care of. There must be, and there is another way. Fundamentally we must revise not only our economic system, but our financial system, so as to do some long-range planning for this thing and not depend upon shots in the arm, these hypodermic injections which we have been using so frequently.

However, I do not condemn hypodermic injections absolutely, either financial or physical. A physician who goes into a hospital and says he will never resort to hypodermic injections, or to the use of drugs because his patient is apt to become addicted to the same, is making a sad mistake, and is showing inhumanity. There is, of course, danger of a patient becoming addicted to the use of drugs when he is carelessly treated for his health. So may our Nation, by these shots in the arm, lead some of our people to become addicted to help from the Government. We must watch out that we do not pauperize our people. I fear that, and I want to avoid that.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Yes; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Does the gentleman feel that in justice to what has been done in the last few years it should be pointed out that the borrowing which the Government has done has been merely to compensate for the failure of private debt to be contracted during those years, which under our present monetary system is the means we depend upon to bring money into circulation.

Mr. MURDOCK or Arizona. The gentleman is right; that is the way we have brought money into circulation and I feel there ought to be other means of bringing money into circulation.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. But that is the explanation of the Government's increase in debt.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. My understanding is that a capitalistic system of society where free enterprise is permitted—which is a system which we have and want to protect—requires borrowing. Therefore an interest-bearing debt is a characteristic feature of our economic society. Our national debt has now reached the point where we are beginning to feel concerned, but I am less concerned than some of my colleagues, when I think of the purpose for which this debt was created.

Textbooks on economics have long taught that it is the business of government to embark upon a spending and building program to furnish employment whenever the periodic depressions of the business cycle hit us, and private employment is reduced. If that was good economic doctrine in classical theory, why is not it good actual practice? And that, as I conceive it, is exactly what we have done.

The gentleman from California will recall that he and I listened 2 hours one evening recently to a distinguished scholar from Sweden who told us that his people believed in balancing the Budget, but that they had found out that it was not necessary to balance it annually. He said they were satisfied to balance it according to each business cycle. There is much food for thought there. I am in favor of our balancing the Budget according to business cycle rather than according to year.

Those who appear so desperately alarmed about our national indebtedness and fearful as to who will pay it and bear the interest burden might do well to consider that the total interest-bearing indebtedness for the country, public and private, is no greater now—indeed, it is less—than the total was in 1929. The difference is that there is now more Government borrowing and lending and less private lending than in 1929. Just so long as we have the American scheme of things, capital will be needed, borrowing will be necessary, and there must be an interest burden. Personally, I would prefer that most of the capital be furnished by private sources and the interest payments necessitated thereby go to private citizens. However, I should want that to be a natural and logical function of our economic and business system and not because of a monopolistic control by any special group. I do not believe that we ought to have a national debt, an interest-bearing debt, merely so some of our wealthy citizens can be coupon clippers.

Alexander Hamilton was of the school that believed a national debt is a national blessing. I can follow his reasoning. I can conceive that a national debt sometimes can be a national blessing, and believe it was in the early days of the Republic; but, on the other hand, I can conceive of a national debt—and we are approaching that situation now—being a menace. Perhaps we have just about reached the point where we do not want to go further into debt. Therefore, in order to help the country rather than to satisfy the desires of the lending class, we must seek some other way of financing that part of the program which the Government must necessarily carry on.

However, I am in agreement thoroughly with one or two remarks made just ahead of me—that it is our job now to find employment for our unemployed in private industry. Really that is why I have asked for this time. A businessman said to me when I was home—and he is my banker, and a glass-eyed individual, at least he was glass-eyed on one or two occasions when I have visited him—that we ought to do something for the small-business man to help him be an employer; we have helped everybody else under heaven, and why not help the small-business man. I agree with him; and although this is not the chief explanation of what he thought ought to be done, I believe that a large part of the unemployment in the State of Arizona would vanish if mining could be resumed in the proper way. There is a great area highly mineralized; there is hidden wealth lying under the ground that ought to be taken out. There are 4,000 members of the small-mine operators in Arizona who have claims and who want to go to work, but these 4,000 small-mine operators have little or no capital. We have come to the aid of the railroads, the building trades, and the farmers, but we have done nothing for the development of mining, and there are about a dozen States in this country where mining is the basic industry. Mining is a hazardous venture, but is it more hazardous than fire, automobile, or marine insurance? Mining is one industry to which all other industries look for materials. Even farming is no more basically necessary than the taking of wealth from the earth, and yet no encouragement, aside from producing the precious metals, has been given our miners. To do two things at once, the Government could stimulate the mining industry and solve the unemployment problem.

Well, you say, "Why don't these mining men go to Wall Street and borrow, or why don't they go to Phoenix and borrow?" They cannot do so for several reasons. The one thing they need is to bring more capital into the mining industry. These men are entrepreneurs in the mining game, if you will allow that expression. These are private owners, and they want to get capital whereby they can go ahead and develop mines as they did 20 or 30 years ago. That is true not only in the State of Arizona, but it is true throughout the West. I believe that a wise policy on the part of this Government to aid such small-business men would give employment to thousands. That would be one of my suggestions.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. I am interested in the gentleman's statement and I want to advance my thought in that connection. I said a moment ago that I believed we paid too little attention to fundamentals and too much attention to details. Now the gentleman is mentioning a problem in connection with the mining industry. Certainly the gentleman recognizes this fact, that in order to have an outlet for the products of those miners there must be a market?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Exactly. That is one of the essentials.

Mr. FADDIS. So the first thing we must do in this country is to restore confidence in the American institutions and in our time-honored economic system until it will produce a market for the products of the mine. Of all industries, mining is so dreadfully expensive labor that you must have a ready market for the products of the mine in order to produce them.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I may say to the gentleman that his State furnishes such a market, but I know one way to improve it. The gentleman will recall how strenuously he labored to get authorization and appropriation for a stock pile of the strategic minerals. His great objective was to lay in a supply of such as quickly as possible as an emergency proposition. The gentleman is aware that the great steel industry of Pennsylvania must have these same strategic minerals and metals, such as manganese and tungsten. The gentleman's State will serve as a ready market for all of these that we can produce. In safety for our country, the gentleman will admit we ought to develop the needed supply at home and not depend upon foreign sources.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FADDIS, Mr. VAN ZANDT, and Mr. PATRICK by unanimous consent were granted permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in thorough accord with the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS]. It is encouraging to hear Members of the House, regardless of which side of the aisle they may represent, talk along such practical lines.

In the last 7 years we have spent $22,108,454,024.98 for relief and recovery. I believe it is safe to say that we are no farther along today on the road to recovery than we were when the program was set up back in 1933. We cannot continue to carry this tremendous burden indefinitely. Already taxes have reached a point where they are acting as a brake on recovery and have lowered our living standard. Further unnecessary expenditures, of course, will be reflected in increasing those taxes and reducing the amount paid to the needy. Our aim should be to find a permanent cure for the unemployment that afflicts us at the present time. Today one out of every six and one-half persons is out of work and 6,000,000 of our youth have never had a steady job.

I have no sympathy with those who would have us believe that one-sixth of our people are on the relief rolls permanently. They do not want to stay on relief. They want jobs. I would rather take an optimistic view of it, that as yet we have but scratched the surface in our country's development. A large majority of those out of work would gladly take a job if it could be found. The thing that we need above everything else, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] so well pointed out, is to restore confidence on the part of those who are engaged in business and who have money to invest.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am in thorough agreement with the gentleman's statement. Would the gentleman desire to express his views briefly on the inducement for capital to invest in productive enterprise through a decrease of the higher surtaxes that we have on our income taxes?

Mr. KNUTSON. Leading economists are of the opinion that our present surtax rates have already passed beyond the point of diminishing returns. In other words, they believe we could get more revenue with modified rates. This view has been held by former Secretaries of the Treasury, and Democrats as well as Republicans. I am inclined to agree with them because, after all, excessive taxation tends to create stagnation and unemployment. On that subject let me quote President Roosevelt in his Pittsburgh address on October 19, 1932:

> Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors because they are a burden on production and can be paid only by production. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and, hence, in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain.

No longer does the cry "soak the rich" have any appeal for the thinking man and woman because they know the rich are being taxed to the limit at the present time. The highest income brackets are taxed 79 percent by the Federal Government, which leaves them 21 percent for living expenses, replacement, expansion, and State and local taxes. How long can a program like that stand up without breaking down? It is time that we take a rational and common-sense view of this whole question. The demagogue has been ranting long enough.

The time has come for us to lay aside partisanship in the consideration of this great question. I want to believe, and I do believe, that those who are now charged with the administration of relief in this country are doing the best that they can. They are acting according to their light, but it would seem that by this time it should be apparent to all that no lasting benefit has accrued from what has already been done, and that it would be futile to expect any benefit of a permanent nature can be derived from the present program in the future.

If I were conducting the relief policy of this Government, I would acquire farms on the outskirts of centers of population, and, instead of putting one family on 160 acres, I would divide that farm up into 30 or 40 small tracts, put a set of buildings on each tract costing $3,000 or $4,000. I would not expect the people that we placed on those tracts to derive their entire income and support from the homestead, but at least it would be a refuge in times of unemployment.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. There is always seasonal work to be had in centers of population. If we could provide those people who are now on relief, or the greater part of them, with a small tract of land that they could work by hand, where a team would not be required, where they could have a cow, a pig or two, a few chickens, and raise their own potatoes and other garden truck—with what they could earn on the side in seasonal work would make them absolutely independent, and that is what they want.

The $22,000,000,000 we have spent on relief and recovery would have provided $6,316 for each of the three and one-half million families on relief. How much of that amount has each family received? We all know that relief has been necessary and will continue to be until we can find jobs for the unemployed, but too much of the relief dollar has gone for administration and too little of it got down where it was needed. Those who have opposed the excessively high administrative cost of relief are called heartless reactionaries who would let the people go hungry. My friends, that is not true.

There is a very considerable element in this country who do not want to see the relief problem solved. They aim to keep that large number under their thumb politically. Then, there are those who have organized large groups of reliefers and make an easy living out of contributions received from people who can ill afford to spend money for that purpose. It is a sad and sordid picture and one that we will not be proud to look back upon when times again become normal.

Relief will have to be continued until industrial production can be speeded up to a point where the unemployed can be absorbed. Unfortunately, the present policy is preventing the speeding up of production, except in a few industries that supply war material.

The charge that Congress has been niggardly in appropriating for relief is not borne out by facts. Such appropriations would have been all-sufficient had they been wisely expended. If it has been found necessary to lay off relief workers the blame must be laid at the door of those who have been charged with spending the money. They have wasted the money we gave them. On all sides we find examples of wasteful spending for needless projects. Congress is not altogether blameless for this sad state of affairs but, primarily, the major blame must be placed on the shoulders of those who failed to grasp the fact that every dollar wasted came out of the pockets of those who are in dire need. Let them explain what has been done with the money we have appropriated for relief and recovery since 1933. The total represents $22 for every minute since the time of Christ, or $22,108,454,024.98, an astronomical figure, and yet there are those who say it should have been much greater.

If we would take our foot off the brake that is holding the machine back while we are climbing a steep grade—and it is the first time in history that we have seen anyone do that in climbing a steep grade—if we would take our foot off the brake, reduce Government spending to actual needs, reduce expenditures in such a way that it will be reflected in a substantial reduction in taxes, which in turn will inspire confidence and provide work for those unemployed but are employable. That would end the depression.

You cannot make me believe that we have reached full development of our country. When I was in Europe last summer I found there was an actual manpower shortage in Germany, France, Belgium, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries. The only country where there was an unemployment problem of any magnitude was in Great Britain. We should not have that problem on our hands. Instead of lagging back way down the list in recovery we should be way out in front in recovery, with our great resources, our untapped wealth.

Today we are No. 20 in point of recovery. We should be No. 1. We should be leading the whole world on the road back to normal times. But we cannot do it, Mr. Speaker, until we have reduced taxes, until we have taken the Government's strangling hand off of the throat of industry, and until we give some assurance that the man who has the courage to invest his money is going to get a fair return on his investment. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, frequently we are getting excited up here when we drift into partisanship, something which has not shown itself today, there has been no partisanship shown here, and it is a refreshing thing. Here is what we are in this country, and I think as lawmakers we might as well just relax and think it out. We Americans are a bunch of people who landed in a country of tremendous resources, the like of which had not been enjoyed by any other people in any other part of the world. This is a storehouse of earth's richest treasure. This is the lap of Croesus here. So, as a people, what did we do? We became naturally a bunch of cold, sotted wastrels. We had so much we did not know what to do with it. We cut down our forests. If trees died by worms, by fire, or general waste we could go across the hollow to find and cut more. There were plenty. We killed off our bison, we recklessly and carelessly plowed our lands. If we plowed it up and down hill and it washed away we could move to another hundred acres across the valley. It could be obtained by mere entry. Not only have we done that with our timber, wild game, and our grasslands, but also with most of our natural resources, and we bolted into the same sort of growth as to our general economic structure. It may be a bit harder to visualize but is as certain a fact.

We now have come to the place where there are 130,000,000 people in this country, and the things that we have enjoyed by reason of natural abundance we find are becoming exhausted. Even our old methods of economics cannot be sustained. The Democrats have been blaming the Republicans and the Republicans blaming the Democrats when as a matter of fact it is just a condition wherein we have caught up with ourselves; we have taken up all the slack and we might just as well blame nobody as anybody else, but have the common sense to get together to figure it out and decide what we had better do, for it we do not learn to operate on a different basis than we have in the past poverty is assured the generation that is to come. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

SOLVING OUR NATIONAL PROBLEMS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that every Member of Congress is interested in restoring normal conditions throughout the country. The question is how to arrive at that solution.

For us to admit in the very infancy, you might say, of this Republic, with all our great natural resources, for us to admit that we are unable to solve these problems certainly would be a confession that would be deadening to the aspirations of the American people.

My contention is that we have the solution in our hands and that it is the duty of Congress to solve these problems. You are not going to do it, however, by borrowing money from the rich and giving it to the poor for all of us to pay back with compound interest, in that way holding down commodity prices, depressing prices, and stultifying human initiative.

I believe in a free economy. The only attack that I have made on private enterprise has been against those monopolies that violate every fundamental principle of the common law. The only time I have ever advocated public ownership was a public ownership of public utilities where they were engaged in a public business, such as the electric power business.

In my opinion, that is the only way we are ever going to solve the problem we have today of these enormous holding companies that impose upon the masses of the American people the exorbitant overcharges that we are now having to pay for electric lights and power.

I have tried to secure for the American people relief from these exorbitant overcharges for electric energy, and I have the happy consolation of knowing that my efforts in that respect have helped to reduce light and power rates in every State in the American Union and in every congressional district represented on this floor. Practically every human being who turns an electric switch anywhere in the United States has benefited by my efforts.

Here we are in the richest land the world has ever seen. We have more wheat, more corn, more cotton, more lumber, and more manufactured articles than we know what to do with. The contention is made that we have a surplus—that we have too much. Yet hungry people are appealing to us on every hand. We try to solve the problem, as I said, by borrowing from the rich and giving to the poor, which is one of the most deflationary programs I have ever known. Agriculture has been regimented, the farmer has been put in a strait jacket and told how much he shall plant, what he shall plant, and what he shall do with it, contrary to all those fundamental principles of the common law on which human freedom and free institutions have been built. We have gathered up the gold of the world, demonetized it, and buried it in the ground. We have demonetized silver. The ones from whom we bought much of this gold have taken the money we paid for it back to countries that have depreciated their currencies and have bought three, four, or five times as much goods with it as they could have bought with the same amount of money in this country.

Under the Federal Reserve Act we have a right to issue currency with a 40-percent gold coverage. This $18,000,000,000 of gold we have buried in the ground would supply a reserve for a sufficient amount of currency to pay the national debt.

Where is our foreign market? It is not in Europe today. We have demonetized silver, as I said a moment ago. When we demonetized silver we killed our foreign markets in the Orient. Silver has been the money of all the Orient since the beginning of time. The first money ever mentioned in Holy Writ was silver. That is the only money the people in the Orient know. That is the only money they can get. When we demonetized silver we killed our foreign trade in the oriental countries. Today our foreign trade is dead; it has come to a standstill; high tariffs and other trade restrictions have killed our European trade, and our silver policy has almost destroyed our oriental trade.

The industrialists are today charging the same prices for their industrial commodities that they were receiving at the peak of agricultural high prices. The farmers are paying the same prices for manufactured articles today that they were paying when cotton was 20 cents or 25 cents a pound and when wheat was $2 or $2.50 a bushel. Our farmers cannot stand it. It is gradually grinding them into the dust. We never will solve this problem until we solve the monetary question—put this gold and silver to work, or put its representative, the currency issued against it, to work, and in that way restore the prices of farm products. Members from industrial centers will say, "You would just raise prices to all." But that would not raise the debt these farmers owe; it would not raise the taxes these farmers have to pay; it would not increase the interests on those debts. But it would increase the farmer's income and give him something to buy with.

You talk about income taxes. The farmers of this Nation, the home owners of this Nation out in the rural sections, pay the highest taxes for the incomes they receive of anybody under the American flag. When you depressed those prices from 20-cent cotton and $2 wheat to 10-cent cotton and $1 wheat, or 8-cent cotton and 80-cent wheat, you simply double the burden he has of paying his taxes, his interest, and the debt against his farm. That is the reason that the onward march of farm foreclosures has continued during the time we have spent these billions of dollars trying to restore prosperity in an illogical way.

A while ago the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] said that these people would not go back to the farms, and he drew, very graphically, the picture of the old conditions back on the farm, of drudgery, montony, silence, no conveniences, the drab life of the farmer of 30 years ago. In the last few years I have waged a successful fight here for rural electrification in this country. I have waged a battle to get electricity to the farmers at rates they can afford to pay, and in my own area I have succeeded.

In other sections of the country we are not only extending the lines, but we are gradually bringing those rates down. If the farmer can get cheap electricity, and he will get it before we quit—if he can have the conveniences you have in the city, the radio, lights, washing machine, water pump, vacuum cleaner, refrigerator, electric range, and electric heat for his house, he would rather live out there.

You notice almost every Congressman who has spoken here today has said that he comes from the farm. If they had the same conveniences out there that they have in the cities, he would never have left the farm. That is the condition we are trying to create. The greatest movement that has ever been instituted to bring about that condition has been rural electrification—taking electricity to the farms of this Nation at rates based upon the cost of the generation, transmission, and distribution.

Mr. PATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PATRICK. I was in the gentleman's area 10 years ago and I have been there recently. I can testify to what he states. Will the gentleman please tell this body the number of people who had lights and modern conveniences in his district 10 years ago compared with today?

Mr. RANKIN. As far as the farmers in my section are concerned, 10 years ago the private power company had one little line that I know of. The company charged them $3.25 a month for line charges and then charged them so much a kilowatt-hour for their electricity. The use of 25 kilowatt-hours of electricity a month in those days cost a farmer on this line $4.50. It now costs him $1 a month under the T. V. A. rates, and 25 cents of that dollar goes to amortize his line. When the line is paid out, then the rates will be further reduced.

You cannot stop this movement toward cheap electricity. The American people have had a taste of it, and the ones who are not tasting it are tasting the bitter fruits of the overcharges they have to pay. They are going to demand lower rates, and by the time another election comes around the rest of you Congressmen will be just as enthusiastic as I am about bringing the rates for electricity down to where the people can pay them.

But that is not the only thing necessary to restore prosperity. I read speeches every day of candidates for the office of President of the United States. Unfortunately some of them are Members of the United States Senate and I cannot criticize a Senator on the floor of the House. However, those speeches sound like the fulminations of school boys as far as touching the great problems with which we have to deal is concerned. They never propose to even attempt to wipe out the disparity between agriculture and industry the tariff has produced. They never make a stab, even, at wiping out the freight rate discriminations that have been bleeding the farmers of the South, the West, and the Middle West for a quarter of a century, shipping uphill, if you please, paying through the nose the overcharges for freight rates. They never attempt to speak on the money question. They avoid this money question for fear they might offend some of the money barons of the Nation. They seem to overlook the fact that we are now in a death grapple with the favored few who have made their fortunes out of the prosperity of the past, whether it was the artificial prosperity of the war or not. These few have made their fortunes and now have their money invested in tax-exempt securities, and many of them live off incomes to which they have never contributed.

Many of them have not earned a dollar of their vast fortunes for three generations, and yet they strive to hold prices down in order that the values of their holdings may be held up. Of these men who are out running for President, not a single one has dared to tell you what he would do with this great wealth of gold we have buried in Kentucky. Oh, for a William J. Bryan, oh, for a William E. Borah on your side, to go to the American people and arouse them to a realization of the fact that we never will cure the conditions with which we are now confronted unless this policy is changed, and that if we follow the policy advocated by these Republican candidates for President the conditions will grow infinitely worse.

What we need today is men who understand this monetary question, men who understand the great economic questions of the day, men who do not have their minds buried in the cesspools of Europe, men who are not itching to get us into a World War, but who are determined to keep us out of the present conflict, men who are interested in the restoration of prosperity for our country, in the prosperity and welfare of the American people now and for generations to come. Through such a policy we can solve the great questions that now confront the Nation, by stimulating and encouraging free enterprise, restoring the farmer's prosperity, and making it possible for him to purchase industrial commodities. That would start the wheels of industry and give work for the unemployed. In that way we can bring back prosperity for all, we can take our people off the relief rolls, we can start the wheels of industry moving, restore prosperity to the farmers of the Nation, and pass this Republic down to the generations to come—a rich and prosperous Nation—the outstanding and unchallenged leader of all the great countries of the world. [Applause.]

Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, unless proposed reciprocal-trade agreements are ratified by the Senate, which was ordered to lie on the table.

INCOME FOR PARITY PAYMENTS TO FARMERS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to several petitions received by me during the last few days from Kansas farmers urging that some permanent financing of the parity payments be approved by Congress.

I read the following petition from Ellsworth County, sent me by C. C. Frevert, of Holyrood, signed by about 80 wheat growers of Ellsworth County:

> We the undersigned farmers and citizens of Ellsworth County, Kans., earnestly petition you to urge Congress to enact some permanent legislation for funds to give us farmers full parity payments on our base production of wheat. We farmers have cooperated with the agricultural-conservation program almost 100 percent, year after year, with the hope that Congress would do the right thing by providing funds by some form of processing tax. For 7 years we have patiently waited for Congress to give us parity prices on wheat. So far it has been nothing but appropriations. Either give us something worth while or else tear down that high tariff wall that has favored the industries for some 100 years. They have no right to special privileges under our democracy.

Also, from Ellsworth County, Mr. J. W. Hoker, of Kanapolis, sends me a petition to the same effect, signed by 40 farmers from that vicinity. Mr. I. H. Hickman, of Kirwin, sends me a similar petition signed by some 90 citizens of Phillips County.

Mr. Frevert in a note accompanying the petition from Holyrood says:

> In a recent article in the paper I noticed appropriations were again started for parity payments. We farmers appreciate help in any form, but this digging into the Federal Treasury cannot long continue.
> I trust Congress will enact the income-certificate plan for raising the money for parity payments, and I trust you will put your efforts back of this.

This morning I received a similar petition from farmers of Barton County, Kans., forwarded me by Mr. H. A. Praeger, of Claflin, master farmer, and one of the straight-thinking wheat growers of Kansas. In an accompanying letter he says in part:

> We are pleased to note that the parity appropriation has been voted for next year. However, to avoid this annual turmoil, we are suggesting that a permanent way of financing the farm program be devised without taking the money from the General Treasury. Another way of helping to balance the Budget. We believe the certificate plan is a step in the right direction.

I have received a number of letters along the same line. These letters and the accompanying petitions came over the week end.

Mr. President, the American farmer has been subsidizing American industry and American consumers at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year for the past decade. His annual income is that much less than Congress has declared he is entitled to under the definition of parity in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

When Congress amended the act in 1938 it authorized parity payments for the five major surplus crops. By implication, at least, it said to the farmers that the Government would do everything in its power to bring about parity income. Directly Congress said that parity payments would be made to assist in attaining this goal.

Mr. President, the farmer does not like these payments from the Treasury. He believes he is entitled to prices on what he sells commensurate with the prices he pays for what he buys. He believes the food and feed and other necessities of life he supplies the people of the United States are worth the cost of production. Congress has told him he is entitled to parity payments. But obviously, from the experiences of the past three sessions of Congress, the financing of parity payments by annual appropriations is not the right way to go about the matter.

I agree with the farmers who are asking for permanent financing. I urge early consideration of the income-certificate plan, and other plans, to attain that end.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed, as part of my remarks, the petition from Barton County, and also that the petition be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The petition referred to is as follows:

> We, the undersigned citizens of Barton County, Kans., are in hearty accord with the principles embodied in the A. A. A. Act, as amended in 1938, with its provisions for conservation and parity payments for those farmers who make full compliance in the program.

We realize the uncertainty that an annual appropriation from the United States Treasury embodies and believe that the raising of these funds would be more just and equitable by some form of a processing-tax or certificate plan. We therefore petition you, as our representative in Congress, to work toward the attainment of this goal.

Mr. CAPPER. I also ask that a letter from I. H. Hickman, prominent farmer of Phillips County, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KIRWIN, KANS., March 28, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: I am sending you a list of names of residents of this community who are desirous of seeing the present farm program continue in its present form without discrimination. We realize that all lines of business is being subsidized and are asking the legislative bodies to protect our interests to the best of their ability.

Another thing the people of the Plains States is vitally interested in is farm mortgages. For the last 2 years there has hardly been room in the county paper to carry the foreclosure notices.

In the last few months the Federal land bank has softened up some and is reamortizing the Commissioner loans from 10 to 20 years. That will help some, but with the drought that we have had in this State for 6 years it is impossible to make any payments above interest. Ninety percent of the loans in Phillips County had to be refinanced.

The people need these loans readjusted to suit the productivity of the farm on which they are placed. There are a great many loans in this territory that the land will not produce in normal times to pay interest and make payments on principal with the size loans they are carrying.

The rate of interest is also too high in comparison to the rate that other branches of business pay. I know that short-time bonds on the money market are sold at less than 1 percent.

It seems to me that these farm-mortgage bonds could be reissued at a much smaller rate than they are now carrying. If you could get the business world to realize the quick upturn in business if the farmer had a few much-needed dollars to spend instead of sending it all away, the wheels of industry would soon be humming, something we would all like to see.

I am sending a copy of this to Mr. FRANK CARLSON.

Very cordially,

I. H. HICKMAN.

We, the undersigned, hereby take this method to express our sentiment to the legislative body of our Government in reference to the following:

It is highly important that the agricultural appropriation be secured in sufficient amount to provide sufficient funds to properly administer all of the present program with its various phases. This cannot be done with any reduction; agriculture must not suffer for the benefit of other appropriations.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation as he understands it.

Yesterday, the Senate entered into a unanimous-consent agreement that debate on the pending amendment or any amendment thereto should be limited to 20 minutes in the case of any individual Senator. Nothing was said about debate on the joint resolution itself; but the Chair has consulted the majority leader, the minority leader, the Senator in charge of the joint resolution, and the Senator who offered the amendment, and the Chair thinks the agreement applies to the pending amendment only, or any amendment thereto, and that the 20-minute limitation will apply to any Senator who wishes to discuss the pending amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in order to clarify the situation, so that those who desire to discuss the pending amendment from now on until the conclusion of the discussion on this amendment may know the situation, I desire at this time to offer a substitute for my pending amendment; and I wish to discuss for just 2 or 3 minutes the substance of the substitute, so that it may be understood what I am offering, and why I am offering it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment. The Chair is of the opinion that the limitation of debate applies also to the substitute under the language of the unanimous-consent agreement. The clerk will state the substitute amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 8, before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That no foreign-trade agreement entered into under such section 350 after the date of enactment of this act shall (1) provide for the reduction of any tax imposed under sections 2490, 2491, 3420, 3422, 3423, 3424, or 3425 of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, (2) provide for any reduction in any excise tax now or hereafter imposed with respect to any article by the United States, or (3) bind the United States not to impose, or not to increase, any excise tax with respect to any article.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer that amendment as a substitute for my pending amendment, and I desire to have it take the place of the amendment I first offered.

The Senate will notice that in the substitute there are set out the identical sections of the statute which were set out in my previous amendment to the joint resolution; and, in addition, the substitute, provides that the Congress of the United States may in the future impose excise taxes and not be interfered with by the so-called reciprocal-trade law. It further provides that any excise tax on any commodity now in existence shall not be interfered with by the reciprocal-trade law.

My reason for offering the substitute is to broaden the field so that, for instance—and I use this as an instance—if there were an excise tax as to vegetable oil, or if the Congress desired to impose an excise tax to protect vegetable oil, to make it possible to limit the influx of vegetable oil into this country, that might be done without interference by those having charge of the enforcement of the reciprocal-trade law. In other words, my object is that Congress shall not lose complete control over that which, in my judgment, Congress is specifically given control—namely, revenue and taxation—so that Congress may impose excise taxes, as in the case of copper, lumber, oil, and coal it has imposed excise taxes. I propose that those excise taxes so imposed up to date shall not be interfered with, in keeping with the explanation I made yesterday on the floor of the Senate; and, in addition to that, I propose that excise taxes imposed as to other commodities by act of Congress, or which have been imposed as to other commodities by act of Congress, shall not be interfered with except by Congress itself.

That is my explanation. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate further, because other Senators may desire to address themselves to the substitute.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, will he yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator in mind any commodity, other than the four which were first enumerated in his amendment, to which the substitute would apply?

Mr. McCARRAN. I answer that at this moment I have not in mind any such commodity; but I have in mind an incident which I think exemplifies what I have in mind in the substitute.

Sometime ago certain Senators proposed legislation by way of bills to affect the tariff on a certain commodity, namely, vegetable oil. They were very much interested in it. It was a question which materially affected them in their respective States. A letter came here from the State Department, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, which letter I had inserted in the RECORD several days ago, in which it was pointed out that the bills introduced by the Senators to whom I have referred should not be favorably looked upon, because they would interfere with existing agreements, or agreements about to be made. It is that which I have in mind. If there are no other excise taxes in the usual sense, there may be; but there are now in existence excise taxes in the way of processing taxes, and the definition covers all processing taxes, because a processing tax within the territorial limits of the jurisdiction of the United States is an excise tax; and the Congress does not want those having control of the reciprocal-trade law to be interfering with excise taxes imposed by way of processing taxes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have a very few words to say on this amendment.

I think the junior Senator from Nevada has made a very clear case. I do not care to go into the question as to the intent of the committee at the time the Reciprocity Act of 1934 was passed; but, notwithstanding all of the debate on the subject, it is quite clear to me that the chairman of the committee, speaking for the committee, did not intend that any of these excise taxes should be affected by the Reciprocity Act.

The argument that the Senate voted down an amendment on this subject is not at all material, according to my idea. As a matter of fact, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the chairman of the Finance Committee, himself offered the amendment. What was the purpose of the Senator from Mississippi in offering such an amendment? It was to prevent those excise taxes from being reduced. Why should he propose to offer that amendment if he did not believe that was the intent of the committee? Some of the Senators have made a great ado over the fact that the amendment finally was not offered by the Senator from Mississippi, but the same amendment was offered by the late Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long. It is apparent from the RECORD why that amendment was voted down—because the amendment not only attempted to protect these excise taxes against being reduced, but it attempted to prevent Congress at any time from increasing them. That was the only reason.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point, will he yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to call the Senator's attention, furthermore, to the fact that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] himself voted against his own amendment when it was offered by the late Senator from Louisiana, which I think further strengthens the viewpoint of the Senator from Nevada that the roll call is highly irrelevant and incompetent and immaterial as an exhibit of the good faith and purpose of the Senator from Mississippi and the authors of the legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think there is any doubt about it. All of the circuitous arguments which have been made here have not affected anyone's sincere belief about this matter.

These excise taxes, so far, are emergency taxes. They are emergency tariffs. They are imposed for short periods of time, to meet an emergency. They come up before the Congress every 2 years, we will say, so that Congress may determine whether or not it wants them continued, whether the emergency has ceased to exist. In the reciprocity law which is to take the place of all tariff laws of this body for the period of possibly 6 years—because there are 3 years in which to make these tariffs, and they may last for 3 years—we have absolutely surrendered, or apparently are about to surrender, all tariff-taxing power for the period of 6 years. That is the intention of the proponents of the joint resolution. The letter of the Secretary of State, to which the junior Senator from Nevada referred, objecting to any action by Congress with regard to vegetable oil, proves it. He will object to any legislation by Congress as conflicting with the policy established in the Reciprocity Act. No Senator can logically come here after this extension passes and say to his fellow Senators, "There is a great emergency existing with regard to a particular article." The proponents of this act will have to reply to him, "Well, what difference does that make? We have surrendered, for the period of 6 years, the right to make tariffs. Go down and see the Secretary of State." The Secretary of State will say, "I have a right to raise the tariff duty, but it is inconsistent with the policy of the act, and I will not do it."

Is it possible that not only is Congress going to delegate for the period of 6 years the tariff-making power, but it is not going to reserve to itself the right to pass an emergency act for the period of 2 years? That is what it means.

I have expressed my views with regard to this delegation of authority, and a majority of the Senators do not agree with me apparently. I have expressed my views as to the unconstitutionality of these agreements, and apparently a majority of the Senate does not agree with me. I do not believe those who do not take my view have considered the matter as serious as I consider it. I notice some writers do not consider it so serious. They refer to a handful of cattle in the State of Nevada. Mr. President, this rises above the consideration of a handful of cattle in the State of Nevada. Nearly every farmer in this country has a few cattle, and every farmer in this country has a right to exist. Every farmer in this country has a right to have the Congress of the United States decide what is necessary for his protection. But we are not doing that. Congress has lightly and frivolously surrendered its most important power, the power of taxation. It has done it not as a result of arguments on this floor but for reasons which should be entirely foreign to the impulses which should actuate us here. There is the love of men, the admiration for men, the pride of authorship, and numerous ulterior motives. We find insignificant writers, who take advantage of the Constitution of the United States in its protection to freedom of the press, belittling men on this floor who dare to speak for the Constitution of the United States and against expediency.

I am at this time appealing to the United States Senate at least to reserve some right of legislation in Congress, at least to reserve the right to enact emergency legislation, which might not last over a year or two years. If we do not reserve that right, if we do not reserve the right to pass emergency legislation—and this character of legislation is emergency legislation—then we surrender not only the tariff-making power but we surrender the power to protect our own citizens in an emergency. That is all I have to say.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point as pertinent to the situation as it affects copper a letter addressed by me to the chairman of the Committee for Reciprocity Information and the reply thereto.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

In the matter of the proposed trade agreement between the United States and Chile.

Hon. HENRY F. GRADY,
Chairman, Committee for Reciprocity Information,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: You have under consideration, so I am advised, the question of the approval of a treaty under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934, as amended.

The chief object of the proposed treaty is the reduction of the excise tax on copper imported into the United States. I voted for the Trade Agreements Act. I voted against the extension of the act, however, in the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress primarily because I believed that agreements executed under the act are treaties within the purview of the Constitution and have no effect until ratified by the Senate of the United States as provided in the Constitution. I believe there is also a serious legal question as to whether, under the act, excise taxes can be reduced. I am certain that it was generally understood in the Senate that agreements made under the act should not apply to excise taxes. The President may be obligated to consider these legal questions. Your committee, however, I realize, are not concerned with them. I therefore go directly to the merits of the proposed agreement as affecting copper.

In my opinion the following facts cannot be successfully controverted:

1. The existing mine capacity in the United States can today supply the demand for copper in the United States.

2. For long periods of time there have been surpluses of copper in the United States which have caused copper mines to reduce their production, in many cases 80 percent.

3. The copper-mining industry is a primary industry in the United States, directly employing many laborers, and indirectly employing many more. In certain Western States it is the largest source of employment.

4. The object of the proposed agreement with Chile is to reduce the excise tax so that Chile may profitably export copper into the United States.

5. Under the unconditional favored nation clause, the reduction in such excise tax applies to Canada, Africa, Bolivia, and other countries equally with Chile.

6. If the reduction of the excise tax permits Chile to economically export copper into the United States, such condition will equally apply to Africa.

7. Conditions may arise in which it would be more profitable for Canada to export her copper to the United States than to Great Britain.

8. The production of copper in the foregoing-named countries is more than sufficient to supply the entire consumption of the United States.

May I base a few statements upon what I have above asserted as facts. I am not advised that there is any substantial unemployment in Chile, or that Chile is encountering any difficulty in finding a market for her copper at the present time. In the United States, at the present time, there is the largest percentage of unemployment in the world. This unemployment situation is the source of the greatest uneasiness in this country. Why even take chances on increasing unemployment in this country through decreasing the production of copper? How can any scientific body in the United States determine the cost of production abroad tomorrow, under present world conditions? What will be the exchange value of the pound sterling tomorrow, or 6 months from now? What will be the exchange value of the French franc tomorrow, or 6 months, or a year from now? The answer to those questions depends upon the result of the war. Who is there among us that can prophesy with regard to the present war? And why should we attempt to? The South and Central American republics are in no better position than is the United States in attempting to determine these questions at the present time. They must adjust their own economies as world conditions require them to do.

I hope that the committee, in its high idealism with regard to certain particular matters, will not overlook the realities that are threatening the world today. Let us be patient and cautious.

I am not taking the liberty to advise the committee. I am not in position to advise the committee with regard to this proposed agreement or any other because, as I have stated, I am of the opinion that such agreements are unconstitutional. I am protesting, however, against the execution of this treaty by the agents of our Government. The facts and the evidence clearly indicate to my mind that the execution of the treaty will very probably result in the flooding of our domestic market with foreign copper, not only from Chile but from Africa and Bolivia. I feel sure, also, that copper will be exported into the United States from Canada until the price in the United States for the Canadian product is beaten down to 9 cents a pound, that being the British fixed price for copper. If the price of American copper is beaten down to 9 cents a pound, Canada will probably export to Great Britain; but Chile and Africa can export to the United States copper at a profit and at a price of less than 9 cents a pound in the United States.

In other words, I believe the facts and the evidence conclusively prove that unless a differential of 4 cents a pound, in the form of the excise tax, is maintained the domestic market will be largely consumed by foreign producers of copper, with the inevitable result of economic distress in many of our States and greatly increased unemployment.

I can conceive that your committee may take issue with me with regard to the facts. I fully realize that your judgment is as good if not better than mine. Admitting that there may be a doubt as to the present effect on reducing the excise tax upon the imports of copper to the United States, still will not you admit that the decrease in the exchange value of the pound sterling and the franc with the American dollar or the rise in the exchange value of the money of other countries would be factors which would affect the advisability of reducing the excise tax on copper? I am sure that you will admit this. Then why act with regard to this matter until war conditions have abated?

I take the liberty of writing you these views because I feel some official responsibility to the Federal Government and my State with regard to these matters, which I consider extremely serious.

Sincerely yours,

KEY PITTMAN.

COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION
Washington, D. C.

NOVEMBER 30, 1939.

The Honorable KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: I have for reply your letter of November 24, addressed to Mr. Henry F. Grady, formerly chairman of this committee and now Assistant Secretary of State, with regard to the proposed trade agreement between the United States and the Republic of Chile as it may affect the excise tax on copper imported into the United States.

Your views in opposition to any reduction in the excise tax on copper in these negotiations will be given careful consideration prior to the commencement of any conclusive negotiations with Chile. In this connection I would call your attention to the fact that the inclusion of copper among the articles announced as under consideration in the negotiations with Chile may not be taken as indicating that it will actually be included in that agreement if it should be consummated. I can assure you that every effort is made to ascertain all the facts before making a concession on this or on any other product.

I am in general accord with your view that the many uncertainties inherent in the present world situation must be taken into account in the consideration of concessions to be made in trade agreements.

This committee, as you state, has no responsibility regarding the legal questions you raise. It has been established to obtain from interested parties facts regarding possible concessions to be given or to be asked for by us.

Sincerely yours,

OSCAR B. RYDER, Chairman.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, my remarks this afternoon are addressed to the question of enacting House Joint Resolution 407, which would extend for another 3-year term legislation, characterized as an emergency measure, first introduced 6 years ago, and whose announced purpose was to enable the Executive to engage in the formulation and execution of foreign-trade agreements, among other things.

I intend to discuss the proposed legislation under five principal headings:

First. Analysis of the proposed legislation;

Second. The constitutional and legislative aspects;

Third. Strategic raw materials and our national defense;

Fourth. Trade agreements and the national economic situation; and Fifth. Effect on economic conditions in the State of New Mexico.

I. ANALYSIS OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Section 350 (a) states the purpose of the act to be the expansion of foreign markets for the products of the United States, and lists, as a means of assisting:

First. The present emergency in restoring the American standard of living;

Second. Overcoming domestic unemployment;

Third. Overcoming the present economic depression;

Fourth. Increasing the purchasing power of the American public; and Fifth. Establishing and maintaining a better relation among various branches of American agriculture, industries, mining, and commerce.

This is to be accomplished, according to section 350 (a)—

By regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets of affording market opportunities for foreign products in the United States.

The President is thereupon authorized—

Whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purposes above declared will be promoted to enter foreign-trade agreements. * * *

TRADE AGREEMENTS AND THE TREATY-MAKING POWER OF THE UNITED STATES

To proceed to subsection (1), I quote it, in part:

(1) To enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof.

This is undoubtedly one of the most dangerous of what I consider unconstitutional extensions of Executive power that has ever been attempted. Indeed, there is no occasion for doubt that the framers of the Constitution and the founders of this Republic would have been aghast at the mere possibility, or at the very thought, of anyone having the thought and idea of undermining the jealously safeguarded and secured rights of the States, represented in the Senate by Senators who act as the guarantors of the right of the people in the several States to be protected from unchecked, unbridled adventures into foreign fields, all too frequently inimical to the best interests of the people of the United States. It is the duty of the elected guardians of the Constitutional guaranties to protect the people from the willful encroachments of appointed administrators whose responsibility ends with their personal loyalty. Need they account to the electorate for their stewardship? Never! But they do not hesitate to invade the political lists in an attempt to tell the voters what to do and how to do it. This overramification of the administrative process has brought about the unintended evils of disregard for personal and property rights. These evils, Mr. President, are the curse of our democracy, and the proposed legislation, in my opinion, is subject to this criticism. These constitutional objections I shall develop more fully under the appropriate heading.

REVENUE PROVISIONS

Proceeding with an analysis of section 2, it authorizes the President—

To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly: Provided, That the President may suspend the application to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts or policies which, in his opinion, tend to defeat the purposes set forth in this section; and the proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation. The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.

Commenting on this subsection, the term "discriminatory treatment" is, to say the least, susceptible of various interpretations, dependent upon the momentary outlook.

It is especially noteworthy that the Executive may also suspend the application of the act if there are "other acts or policies which, in his opinion, tend to defeat the purposes set forth."

Mr. President, what is the meaning of this language? Please note that there is no possibility of review of the Executive's actions, for the act merely requires that he have an opinion. And even if this "opinion" results in deprivation of rights, valuable rights, there is still nothing, under the act, that can be done about it. What must the President's opinion include? Merely his decision that—

Other acts or policies * * * tend to defeat the purpose.

I submit, Mr. President, that here is the ultimate in encroachment upon the legislative power, in the authorization of misuse and abuse of discretionary power; it makes the President the sole judge of what acts or policies tend to defeat the purposes of the act. Who will ever know what motivates the Executive in his absolutely final determination to enter into treaties or agreements? Yet that final determination is fraught with the gravest consequences.

Why did the framers of the Constitution insist on incorporating a specific check, that is, the requirement that two-thirds of the Senators must concur in their advice and consent, if the President is now to be given a blank check, while the responsibility remains ours? This can only result in an aggravation of the maladjustment in our Federal governmental structure.

HEARING AND NOTICE OF HEARING

A feeble attempt to give a semblance of protection to those whose rights and interests would be jeopardized by the conclusion of foreign-trade agreements is contained in section 4, which reads in part:

SEC. 4. Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. * * *

In spite of this provision, the right of the manganese producers to present their case to the Department of State, charged by the President with the administration of the act, I am informed, was completely disregarded, and no opportunity was afforded for such presentation.

Although ostensible protection is thus afforded, this seeming protection is worse than useless, for it lulls into a false sense of security those who might otherwise be more alert were they not confident that the administration of the act would be conducted in a sound and wise manner.

Bitter criticism has resulted from a failure to carry out these legislative mandates; and now, Mr. President, we are at the crossroads. Shall we who are charged with the protection of the rights of those who repose their trust and confidence in us abandon what we consider to be a proper interpretation of the Constitution?

II. CONSTITUTIONAL AND LEGAL ASPECTS—CONSTITUTIONALITY

When the delegates from those of the Thirteen States that were represented in Philadelphia met in the Constitutional Convention in 1787, they met as representatives of sovereign States which had lately achieved a complete measure of independence and whose sovereignty was in no sense limited except by their own consent. These representatives were confronted with the problem of foreign relations; how best to carry on their common cause by unified action, yet retaining final control over the negotiations and international transactions which they could not carry on in the minute detail made essential by the nature of this work. Therefore regarding the Executive of the United States as the agent of the States for this purpose, the framers of the Constitution, and the people who adopted it, imposed a check on what would otherwise have been the untrammeled authority of the Executive. This check was the power reserved to the representatives of the States sitting in this Chamber to approve or withhold approval from agreements or treaties negotiated by the President in the course of his Executive conduct of foreign relations. However, there is no indication that either the framers or the people had the slightest intention of exempting from the general theory of separation of powers but controlled by "checks and balances," constituting the very cornerstone of our democracy, such a large body of international treaties as these trade agreements.

Before examining the question of constitutionality further, I may say without any hesitancy that, judging by the nature of their utterances, the founders of this Government would have been shocked at the suggestion that the Executive be given the power to conclude treaties or agreements finally without referring them back to the Senate; our elder statesmen would have regarded this as abdication rather than as a delegation of a power that was expressly entrusted to the Senate representing the people of the States of the United States. That safety device was not meant to be carelessly discarded by the legislative body and allowed to fall into the eager hands of the Executive. To be most emphatic, and to guard against any misuse or abuse of the treaty-making power, the constitutional provision requires that treaties may be made "provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur" (art. 2, sec. 2).

Prior to the establishment of the Federal Union, under the Articles of Confederation, the treaty-making power was exercised by the various States "in Congress assembled." There is no doubt that the individual States had complete sovereignty prior to their entry into the Federal Union and in making treaties, as, for example, the treaties with France of February 6, 1778, each individual State bound itself and thereby extended the operation of the treaty to its territory.

Under the Constitution the article relative to the legal nature of a treaty reads:

> This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land * * * (art. vi).

The wording of the second clause is—> and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States.

From the clear context of the language of this article together with article X, section 1, "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation," there would seem to be a complete renunciation on the part of the individual States of the treaty-making power in favor of all the States collectively viewed as "the more perfect union." To develop further the concept of the sovereignty of the individual States prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, I quote from the words of Mr. Justice Samuel Chase, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Ware v. Hylton (3 Dall. 199):

> I consider this as a declaration (referring to the Declaration of Independence), not that the united colonies jointly, in a collective capacity, were independent States, etc., but that each of them was a sovereign and independent State—that is that each of them had a right to govern itself by its own authority, by its own laws without any control from any other power on earth (at p. 224).

But, in the interests of their collective welfare, the States gave up a certain measure of their treaty-making power, which was, of course, plenary at first, as is the case with all sovereign States. But how far did this delegation go? It went to the extent of having the President designated as the agent for the negotiation of treaties, and their ratification—

> By and with the advice and consent of the Senate * * * provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Therefore, although there is delegation, it is not unlimited delegation. But restricting the President's power to make treaties is the retention of the right to "advise and consent" in the Senate as the body representative of the States.

On this point I quote the words of an eminent authority on the treaty-making power of the United States—Dr. James Brown Scott—who, in an address delivered before the meeting of the American Society of International Law, on April 28, 1934, said:

> Without the advice and consent of the Senate the President of the United States cannot legally exercise the treaty-making power * * * the President is thus the general agent of the people of the United States; the Senators are agents of the people within each of the individual States.

If this power of approval or "advice and consent" is regarded as one of the reserved powers belonging to the people of the several States, it was meant and is meant to constitute a true check upon any reckless, capricious, and whimsical international engagement which the Executive might otherwise be tempted to make. Had it not been for this constitutional protection vested in and exercised by the Senate in fearless and timely manner when the Versailles Treaty and the League of Nations Covenant were before it, this country, contrary to the wishes of our people, might be embroiled in the present European conflict.

While we may have supreme confidence in the present Executive and in our Secretary of State, our beloved and revered former colleague, Mr. Cordell Hull, there is no assurance that during the next 3 years there may not be changes in both these offices. While we trust Mr. Hull, yet there are incidents that shake our confidence in the conduct of our foreign relations, such as recent utterances by our diplomatic representative to Canada, James Cromwell, who so far forgot himself and the best interests of his country as to fall into the error described by George Washington as an "excessive sympathy" which betrays us. Other diplomatic representatives, recently called home from European posts for consultation and conference, have been given much space in the newspapers lately in connection with the origin of the present European war, although I find it difficult to believe that they would have been so careless as to leave any written memoranda lying about.

If the proposed trade-agreements law is to be administered in the same spirit of impartiality as has characterized our neutrality, then our domestic economy will be as definitely jeopardized as has been the firm and oft-manifested intention of our people—and I refer to those who would have to do the fighting, the bleeding and dying, not those who would make the millions in profit—to keep and enjoy the blessings of peace. What guaranty have we, leaving aside the unconstitutionality of the proposed legislation for the moment, that the administration of the proposed statute will not result in a warped and unbalanced economic situation? Delegation of such power to anyone is dangerous; exercise of such power by an incompetent administrator would be vicious.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Chair is compelled to announce that under the unanimous-consent agreement the time of the able Senator from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I will speak on the bill, then, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement relates solely to the amendment which is under consideration. It is the opinion of the Chair that under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senator cannot speak on the bill now in addition to the time consumed by him under the 20-minute limitation.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I did not clearly understand the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, 20 minutes alone were permitted for discussion of the pending amendment.

Mr. CHAVEZ. One moment, Mr. President. The reason I suggested that I would proceed and speak on the bill was that when the Chair announced the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into after consultation between the majority leader, the Senator from Nevada, and other Senators, I understood that Senators could speak for 20 minutes on the amendment, and then, if they desired, proceed and speak on the bill. However, I shall speak further on another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the unanimous-consent agreement extended only to the amendment under consideration.

Subsequently, following Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S speech on his amendment, Mr. CHAVEZ resumed and concluded his speech, as follows:

Mr. CHAVEZ obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Davis	Johnson, Colo.	Schwartz
Ashurst	Donahey	King	Schwellenbach
Austin	Ellender	La Follette	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, it is my purpose to resume the discussion interrupted earlier in the day by the time limit under the unanimous-consent agreement on the McCarran amendment. I shall proceed to discuss with the Senate the matter of strategic raw materials and our national defense.

III. STRATEGIC RAW MATERIALS AND OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. President, in the defense of our country, which many people believe to be more vital today than ever before in view of the troubled state of various continents, certain strategic raw materials are essential. The domestic development of adequate supplies of such resources is the avowed and announced public policy of the Government of the United States, for both the legislative and executive branches have so declared themselves. Yet, although this is our public policy, the administration of the Trade Agreements Act has had the very opposite effect, for quantities of foreign manganese have been imported at the expense of the development of domestic sources. This cannot be justified on any basis, for manganese is essential in order to make steel alloys flexible, durable, and resistant. Manganese removes carbon and sulfur and makes the steel less brittle than it would otherwise be. Manganese steel is used for armor plate, guns, machine tools, and for countless other strategically important purposes.

Some of my colleagues have mentioned other commodities which have been adversely affected by the Executive's trade-agreement policy, but none has suffered more than manganese, this really vital strategic raw material so essential to our national defense and recognized as such by the executive and legislative branches. What is the situation with respect to manganese? Actually, Mr. President, in spite of oft-reiterated and emphatic statements that the domestic production of manganese is so necessary to our national defense, nevertheless, on February 2, 1935, the United States and Brazil signed a reciprocal-trade agreement which, among other concessions, provided for a reduction of 50 percent in the American duty on manganese ore imported from Brazil. But this reduction was not confined to Brazil, where production would have been stimulated had it been so confined, but instead the reduction was extended to Russia. The latter country has continued to be the major shipper of manganese ore to the United States.

By providing a suitable protective tariff in accordance with the recommendations of the most prominent officials identified with our national defense, the domestic production of manganese was increased in the following manner:

Ore containing from 5 to 10 percent manganese increased from 62,670 tons in 1921 to 1,110,067 tons in 1929.

From 10 to 35 percent manganese went from 8,439 tons in 1921 to 364,312 tons in 1926.

Ore containing 35 percent manganese or more was developed from 13,531 tons in 1921 to 98,324 tons in 1925.

The Tariff Act of 1922 provided a duty of 1 cent per pound on metallic manganese-containing ores running about 30 percent metallic manganese. Now the duty has been extended—Tariff Act, 1930—so that 1 cent a pound duty is levied on all imports containing 10 percent or more of metallic manganese. In spite of all statements deriding efforts to produce high-grade manganese from low-grade ore, this has been accomplished, and accomplished on a commercially sound basis, where a minimum amount of protection was afforded to this industry. While the President, in his message to Congress March 2, 1935, in which he urged the adoption of a trade-agreement program, said:

> You and I know, too, that it is important that the country possess within its borders a necessary diversity and balance to maintain a rounded national life, that it must sustain activities vital to national defense, and that such interests cannot be sacrificed for passing advantage.

Yet a 50-percent reduction on the duty on manganese was agreed to by the Department of State 11 months later. In spite of the plain requirements of the law, and for reasons never given, domestic manganese producers, I am informed, were not notified nor afforded an opportunity for hearing prior to the reduction in the duty on manganese imported under the trade agreement with Brazil.

It does not appear that the War Department was either considered or consulted by the Department of State prior to negotiation of this agreement. The responsible officials of the War Department were unaware of this reduction until after the agreement had been concluded. This is indeed a lamentable, regrettable state of affairs. Nor did the Department of State make any attempt to obtain information as to the status of domestic manganese production prior to the negotiation of the agreement.

In testimony before the Finance Committee of the Senate, Hon. Francis B. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State, speaking of the trade-agreement legislation, said:

> The whole purpose of the program of trade bargaining is this—to restrict the commodities covered in the agreement with any specific country to commodities of which that country furnishes the chief source of supply of importation into the United States.

If this was really the purpose, the Department chose a strangely opposite method to accomplish it. Manganese duties were reduced with respect to Brazil although Brazil shipped no managanese at all to the United States during the year 1933, and manganese was not listed in the public announcement of items being imported from Brazil, although the complete list of items released by the Department of State prior to the agreement included items with a value as low as $386 (cabinet woods) imported by the United States from Brazil during the preceding year. Although nominally the reduction was effective on the nonimported Brazilian manganese, actually Russia was the third-party beneficiary under this major concession.

While the Department of State has been apprised of the true situation, and while the War Department is keenly aware of the immediate necessity for the further development of domestic manganese, no action has been taken to restore the duty on manganese ore, which is so essential to the creation of an adequate reservoir of manganese for the steel industry in time of emergency. While lack of production has stunted the growth of the manganese industry, steel has steadily forged ahead under the stimulus of a bountiful subsidy which effectively eliminates all danger of foreign competition. In the 15 years from 1922 to 1937 this subsidy in the form of duties on steel cost the American consumer about eight and one-half billion dollars, or somewhat more than half a billion dollars a year. It could hardly be argued that the United States steel industry, the largest producer in the world, is an infant industry; nevertheless, it still enjoys a formidable tariff protection.

Our experience with manganese requirements in the last war is enlightening. We were made to pay 500-percent increase over normal prices by our foreign suppliers; and even at such a fanciful selling price it was difficult, and at times impossible, to obtain any at all. Not only have we failed to protect our manganese development, but some eighteen and one-half million dollars in revenue have been lost to the Federal Government by the reduction in manganese tariff duties.

Mr. President, I submit that the reciprocal trade-agreement policy has been a signal failure in this as in other instances.

TRADE AGREEMENTS AND THE ADMINISTRATIVE PROCESS

The gradual steps whereby an attempt was made to grant to the Executive the power to make treaties called "Reciprocal Trade Agreements" are noteworthy. The first serious extension occurred when the flexible-tariff provision was written into the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act—1922—which established a 50-percent range within which the President might raise or lower tariff duties. The vast and essential difference between the constitutionality of the Fordney-McCumber Act and the present proposal lies in the existence in the former case of a definite and intelligible standard—the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad was to determine the President's action in raising or lowering the tariff within the fixed limits imposed by the legislature—whereas in the present legislation no such limitation as to trade-agreement negotiation is established. There is a grave danger in these seemingly temporary expedients of 3-year grants of power—constituting virtual abdication—but the proponents urge that it is only a temporary expedient in the interest of the economic welfare of the country. How long will it be before this temporary expedient will crystallize into a permanent power?

There is under way a concerted effort toward centralization and concentration of power in the hands of the Federal Government—a centralization that is the very antithesis of the small, vestigial remnant which may be left of the States' rights which Thomas Jefferson and his associates so ardently defended. This balance of power between the States and the Federal Government has been displaced and encroached upon in devious, subtle, and insidious ways ever since 1865.

Mr. President, unless we heed the warning signals which should be plain to all who can read, the American system, the system of checks and balances, will be gone forever. Why is it that while attacks are being made upon the totalitarian governments and the enormous concentration of power in their dictators, our own Government is constantly seeking new ways of increasing its power at the expense of the States and the duly elected representatives of the people? Administrators, so-called, are not elected representatives, nor are they responsible to the people. They need not answer at the polls for their misconduct. This administrative irresponsibility leads to a careless disregard of the rights of the individual States and of the people, to abuses of power, and sometimes to a willful deprivation of rights which not even our democracy can indefinitely endure.

These foreign-trade agreements, so-called, have a far-reaching effect, perhaps not entirely understood, and may be, and indeed have been, in conflict with earlier treaties and statutes. Yet by what superior magic does the act of the Executive overrule the will or approval of the people as expressed in a properly formulated and ratified treaty?

Reference has frequently been made during our debates to various statements in Hampton Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394 (1928)). In that case, the sine qua non of legislative delegation of power was established as "an intelligible principle" or standard which would establish a sufficiently identified and restricted framework beyond which the Executive could not go. As to unintelligible standards, we have the basic case of United States v. Cohen Grocery Co. (255 U. S. 81 (1921)). There the standard was not sufficiently definite to be intelligible to persons subject to the Lever Act (41 Stat. 298, Sec. 2 (1919)); and subsequently, in Small Co. v. The American Sugar Refining Co. (267 U. S. 233), this lack of intelligibility was further explained in the Court's opinion, which stated:

> It was not the criminal penalty which was held invalid, but the exaction of obedience to a rule or standard which was so vague and indefinite as really to be no rule or standard at all * * *.

Subsequently, it was stated:

> The prohibition (in the Lever Act) was declared a nullity because it was too vague to be intelligible * * *.

According to this decision, its consequences are not limited to criminal prosecutions (Standard Chemical Corporation v. Waugh, 231 N. Y. at p. 54).

More recently, in the decision of Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S. 288 (1935)), the Chief Justice of the United States, speaking for all but one of his colleagues on the Supreme Court, found section 9 (c) of the act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 200, sec. 9 (c)), which provided that—

> The President is authorized to prohibit the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and the products thereof produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted to be produced or withdrawn from storage by any State law or valid regulation * * * thereunder * * *. Any violation of any order of the President issued under the provisions of this subsection shall be punishable by fine of not to exceed $1,000 * * *—

To be unconstitutional, because the delegation was so broad that "delegation" would there have been a misnomer, and, in very truth, the effect of the act would have been to substitute the Presidential rule-making authority for any further necessity of having a legislative body.

Indeed, is this not the situation which confronts us here? Mr. President, what is to prevent a complacent and indulgent Congress from granting the President power "to enter into agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof," and since the present legislation reads:

> SEC. 250. (a) * * * the President * * * is authorized from time to time * * * (1) to enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; * * *.

Who, after all, is to define the term "agreement"? Is there any guarantee that "agreement" may not become an all-inclusive term which will leave "treaty" with form, but no substance?

Mr. President, I am convinced that it would be a mistake to permit this extension of an act which has gone too far toward engulfing us in the mire of indifference to valuable rights of the citizens of this country.

To understand more fully the nature of a treaty, it is appropriate to examine judicial pronouncements which have been decisive on this point in the past.

In Foster v. Neilson (2 Peters 253) Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said:

> Our Constitution declares a treaty to be a law of the land. (Constitution, art. VI, cl. 2.) It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial departments; and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the Court. * * *

Mr. Justice Field, in Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S. 258 (1890)), said:

> That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and the government of other nations is clear. * * * The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. * * * But, with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country.

In J. Ribas E. Hijo v. United States (1. P. R. Federal Reports, 71) the court said, referring to the effective date of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain following the Spanish-American War:

The President has not the power to terminate the war by treaty without the advice or consent of the Senate of the United States.

Of course, it is understood that a treaty of peace is eminently political in character; but until recently there never was any doubt that commercial agreements were treaties in the constitutional sense of the word and would have to be referred to the Senate for approval. In short, Mr. President, the distinction between political and commercial treaties is essentially pretextual, and not real.

While these observations are basic, there is another criticism that is fully as significant, although touching upon the prerogatives of the House of Representatives rather than upon the treaty-approval power of the Senate. The Constitution requires that all revenue legislation must originate in the House of Representatives.

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives (art. I, sec. 7)—

Is the exact language.

Under the pending measure revenue legislation may be enacted by the Executive without any reference to the Congress—another deplorable example of the attempted breakdown of the principle of the separation of powers which the founders of our Government wove into the very fabric of this constitutional democracy.

Senators, I warn you, if this Executive usurpation of power is not checked now, in a year or two it will be too late. We must take inventory now and appraise the amount of damage inflicted upon our form of government by the heedless actions of the Congress in granting, without a thought of the morrow, most of the powers requested—or giving them as a result of persuasion—to the Executive.

Years ago "taxation without representation" was a real issue, one which I seem to recall had much to do with the dissolution of the political ties that had united the American Colonies to England.

IV. ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM

While the published statistics of the operation of the trade-agreements program looks rather favorable at first blush, a careful analysis does not indicate that this is really the result of this program. In fact, one would be entirely too optimistic to suggest that the trade agreements alone had accomplished much of this.

Analyzing the statistics for the year 1939, it is observed that December 1939 saw the highest total of exports since March 1930. Yet we are all aware of the tremendous demands made upon the United States by the belligerent powers the moment the arms embargo was lifted. Would anyone dare to suggest that the abandonment of the embargo was not directly responsible for the tremendous upsurge of exports witnessed last December?

To illustrate the real significance of December's foreign trade: The first 11 months of 1939, compared with the equivalent period of 1938, show an increase of only 4.9 percent. However, when December is taken into consideration, an increase of 8.1 percent for the entire year resulted. Both of these figures apply only to countries covered by reciprocal-trade agreements, which, of course, are the countries that enjoy the advantages of a beneficial trade relationship with us. In the nonagreement countries the decrease in exports amounted to only 4.5 percent for the entire year, comparing 1939 to 1938, instead of 7.9 percent for the first 11 months, indicating that here, too, lifting the embargo had a much more perceptible effect than the mere conclusion of trade agreements. Comparable differences as between the 11-month period and the entire year are shown in the import statistics.

As an example of the effect of the embargo repeal, I cite exports of aircraft in December of each of the 2 years under consideration, 1939 and 1938. In December 1939—the first full month of unlimited war-material exports—the value of airplanes sent overseas amounted to $28,900,000, compared to $5,700,000 in December 1938.

Mr. President, this should indicate the significance of the embargo repeal as contrasted with the reciprocal trade agreement program. December 1939 saw a 500-percent increase in the value of exports of aircraft. Perhaps, with the undertaking of the executive department to furnish the Allied governments with the latest type of airplane not yet furnished in quantity to the United States Army, future export-trade statistics will look even brighter to the uninitiated. But, Mr. President, will that be the result of reciprocal-trade agreements, or will it be the result of a form of artificial respiration, a "shot in the arm," or oxygen-tent stimulus which has its dangerous side? For while the operation may be successful, the patient may die.

While surgeons may bury their mistakes, legislators and governments find their mistakes haunting them, dogging their very footsteps, and plaguing them with economic misfortune and political downfall.

I have no desire to bore you with a lengthy analysis of the foreign-trade statistics, for the preparation of which I am indebted to the Trade Agreements Unit of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, whose statistical studies have been helpful and revealing.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks tables published in the February 17, 1940, issue of Commerce Reports, entitled "Results Under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program During 1939," bearing in mind at all times that these tables have not attempted to differentiate between the increased volume of business brought about by the artificial stimulus of belligerent operations and what I consider the unconstitutional stimulus of the reciprocal trade agreements program.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Including the 18 countries (and colonies) with which agreements were in operation during the greater part of the last 12 months. Only 1 of the agreements was in operation throughout 1935, 6 throughout 1936, 14 by the end of 1936, 16 by the end of 1937, 17 by the end of 1938, and 18 by the end of 1939, including the agreement with the United Kingdom (covering also Newfoundland and the non-self-governing British colonies). The agreement concluded with Turkey became provisionally effective only on May 5, 1939, and the agreement with Venezuela only on Dec. 16, 1939. Statistics for these countries are therefore not included in the above calculations.

[2] These figures do not include Ecuador, the United Kingdom, Newfoundland, and non-self-governing British colonies, Turkey, and Venezuela with which agreements have been concluded but where the period during which the agreement has been in effect is too short to justify inclusion for purposes of comparison.

[3] The apparent discrepancy shown by these figures in comparison with the other totals is due to the noninclusion of trade with Ecuador and the United Kingdom and its Crown colonies.

[1] Reciprocal-trade agreements with Turkey and Venezuela, became effective on May 5 and Dec. 16, 1939, respectively.

[2] For statistical purposes, trade with Austria beginning May 6, 1938, and trade with the Sudeten area beginning Nov. 10, 1938, as far as ascertainable, has been included with Germany, while with the other Czechoslovak Provinces occupied by Germany, Hungary, and Poland has been included with these countries since Mar. 18 or 19, 1939.

[3] Since Aug. 6, 1939, a commercial agreement has been in effect between the United States and the Soviet Union under which the latter country expressed its intention to purchase annually American goods to the value of at least $40,000,000 and, on its part, the United States undertook to accord to the commerce of the Soviet Union unconditional most-favored-nation treatment.

Mr. CHAVEZ. In the years 1928–29, or in the era preceding the economic depression, the total foreign trade of the United States (including exports and imports) was approximately $10,000,000,000 in value. In spite of the elaborate trade-agreements program effective for the past 6 years, the year ending December 31, 1939, shows a total foreign trade of only five and a half billion dollars, which is slightly in excess of 50 percent of the 1928–29 level.

It is my reasoned and recondite conclusion, reached after mature deliberation, that even were the proposed legislation constitutional, the practical economic effects of these trade "agreements" in no wise justifies any further appropriation whatsoever for this work.

Mr. President, just a few more words in conclusion; and what I am about to state was possibly brought about by a statement made on the floor during the day.

It sounds very fine to have members of a legislative body recognized as statesmen. It is very nice to listen to arguments that this legislation will be beneficial and to the interest of the entire country. Nevertheless, throughout the years I have observed that whenever legislation is presented that may have a detrimental effect on certain States or on certain sections of the country, there is no hesitancy on the part of the representatives of the people of those sections or States in raising their voice in protest. Hence, when I visualize what might be possible under the provisions of the pending legislation, when I think of the effect it may have on the industries of New Mexico, I, sir, raise my voice in protest against such legislation.

Mr. President, in point of industrial development New Mexico is practically a new State, although historically we stand with Arizona as the oldest settled areas of the entire United States. Because of the distance of the markets of the industrial world, it took New Mexico a long, long while to come into its own. As a matter of fact, we have hardly scratched the surface of our natural resources—resources that can be developed and will sustain an empire. Yes, Mr. President, we have water, we have minerals, we have timber, we have clay, and many other undeveloped resources. Of later years the State has commenced to develop industrially. Were I to tell you that in 1928 you could have gone to Hobbs, in Lea County, N. Mex., and that people would have offered you acreage at 50 cents an acre, you would have thought they were trying to "put something over" on you. However, the same acreage is now a proven oil-producing area. The Hobbs field alone has a potential proven capacity of over 1,000,000 barrels daily. The Eunice Monument and the Jal fields, a few miles to the south, are just as large, and have proven capacity, not anticipated in dreams, but actual wells that can and do produce oil. In Eddy County, directly to the west of these fields, another oil field is in operation and in actual production. These oil fields have tremendous possibilities that mean a great deal not only to the particular counties of New Mexico in which they are located but to the entire United States.

In keeping with orderly processes for the conservation of natural resources, New Mexico has joined Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas and is making compacts by which the production of oil is prorated. Although we have a proven capacity to produce millions of barrels daily, under the proration agreement the production of only 150,000 barrels a day is allowed.

Many of the wells that are now producing are located on lands that belong to the State of New Mexico—lands that were given to the State by the Federal Government in the early days for the upkeep of our schools. The oil is produced by high-class labor that is well paid. The tool dresser gets from $10 to $14 per day. The common laborer gets a wage in keeping with the American standard of living. With millions of people out of work, and with thousands out of work in New Mexico, I, for one, do not think it is right or just that while we are reducing our production of oil it should be possible to have tankers come up the Atlantic coast to the eastern refineries with oil from Colombia, from Venezuela, and other places—oil that has been produced by cheap labor—and allow it to compete with American oil production. It is obstructing the development of our own wealth.

So much for oil.

Mr. President, New Mexico has the only two potash mines in the entire United States. The United States Potash Co. and the American Potash Co. went into New Mexico during the years of the depression and spent millions of dollars in sinking shafts and developing the mines. They sank shafts some thousand feet deep, and from there commenced tunneling in every direction of the compass—sometimes for miles—to get out the ore. They have invested thousands and thousands of dollars in putting up refineries in Carlsbad, N. Mex., in order to refine the ore. Before the development of these mines, most of our potash came from Germany or Spain. Potash is extremely necessary to the farmers of the country and, I may say, might be considered a strategic material for national defense. Being a Senator from the State of New Mexico, I certainly am not going to vote for legislation that might—because it is possible—interfere with the orderly future development of the potash industry in my State.

I know it has been stated over and over again that the stockmen, cattlemen, and sheepmen are doing well now and that their commodity prices are above parity. How easily we forget. It was only a few years ago that things were so bad with the cattle business of the West that the National Government had to take action and purchase the dying cattle for as low as $8 a head. The trade agreements may not now or in the future interfere with the stock industry of my State; but I, for one, am not willing to take a chance on what might happen. I would rather not give authority for such possibilities.

Mr. President, there are millions of acres of timberland in New Mexico; there are millions of acres of coal lands in New Mexico. I feel confident that if the Bureau of Mines of the Department of the Interior were consulted it would furnish information to the effect that New Mexico is possibly the only State in the entire West that produces both anthracite and bituminous coal.

Mr. President, in southwestern New Mexico there are copper camps, beautiful little cities and villages with churches, good schoolhouses, paved streets, electric lights. The people of these cities and villages are dependent upon the development and carrying on of the copper industry. The coal we produce, the lumber we produce, the copper we produce is produced by American labor. Wages are generally good, although possibly not as good as I would like, but certainly more than those paid in the Belgian Congo or elsewhere. Some few years ago the Congress in its wisdom—wisdom arrived at after looking into the matter and fully investigating the conditions of the various industries—placed an excise tax on the importation of coal, the importation of lumber, and the importation of copper—three commodities produced in my State. I do not care to vote for legislation which might result in taking away the little protection these three industries in my State have in the way of an excise tax.

Mr. President, I believe that at the last session Congress passed a law, sponsored by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], which had to do with the national defense and with the development of strategic raw materials. Among the materials enumerated in the reports to the committee and to the Congress was manganese. I feel quite confident that there is not one person in this body who minimizes the importance of manganese. The production of manganese in large quantities is a new thing in the United States. There are thousands and thousands of acres of manganese in Luna, Hidalgo, and Grant Counties in New Mexico. Since the passing of the Thomas law American citizens have gone into that area and are now developing the manganese mines. I am informed by persons in a position to know that around Deming, N. Mex., where some manganese mines are located, the depth of the manganese mineral is as much as 600 feet. Is it not plain that it would be in the interest of national defense, in the interest of the economic welfare of this country, to develop this industry and thereby help take from the relief rolls thousands of persons and give them private work? Mr. President, we appear concerned about the unemployed. Nevertheless, in my opinion, the proposed legislation now pending will retard the employment of unemployed citizens and will only help develop other countries. The manganese industry, a new industry, is trying in every way possible to continue to live while we get tons and tons of manganese mineral from Brazil and Russia.

I may not be a statesman, but since a very young chap I have heard the saying that "charity begins at home." Certainly I do not feel justified in voting for legislation that would interfere with the orderly development of manganese. I owe a certain duty and allegiance and loyalty to the citizens of my State. They sent me here. I also feel that I am doing my duty as a United States Senator if I protest legislation which, in my opinion, may keep people out of work and be detrimental to American labor.

WHITE BOOK PUBLISHED BY GERMAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in pursuance of my statement made yesterday in reference to Mr. Sumner Welles, Under Secretary of State, and his recent trip to Europe, and also in reference to the so-called White Book issued by Germany, I desire now to bring to the attention of the Senate an article which I clipped from the Times-Herald this morning entitled "Potocki Aides Brand Nazi Charge False."

I desire to call the attention of the Members of the Senate to a paragraph in this article which reads:

> The embassy spokesman said that the letterhead definitely pointed out that there was no connection with Washington, but rather with Stockholm.

In other words, those responsible for this interview state that the information evidently emanated from Sweden rather than from Washington or elsewhere. It is difficult for me to understand why it is stated in the headlines that the charges are branded as false, and in the body of the article they are virtually admitted by the statement that perhaps the truth is contained in the article, but instead of emanating from Paris, London, or Washington they emanated from Stockholm.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this particular article printed in the RECORD at this juncture.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of April 2, 1940]

POTOCKI AIDES BRAND NAZI CHARGE FALSE—WHITE BOOK RIDICULOUS FORGERY, THEY DECLARE

A letter, which is among the exhibits in the German White Book, and which is designated as having been written by Polish Ambassador Jerzy Potocki, was branded as "false and ridiculous" by Polish Embassy officials last night.

Embassy officials were shown a photostatic copy of the letter which the German White Book brands as an open admission that the United States shares in the present war guilt.

WORDING "GARBLED"

An embassy spokesman interpreted the letter as having nothing whatsoever to do about the war, but rather about the abilities of a certain and unidentified Mr. Hudson. The wording so far as Polish usage is concerned, Embassy officials said, was garbled and was interpreted in this manner:

"In connection with the report April 8 as of this year for the legation communicates that further informations are received on the subject of the stay of Mr. Hudson in Stockholm are witnessed to that in this territory he obtained major successes. It happens that Mr. Hudson will prove ability in conducted conversations * * *." (The rest of the letter could not be interpreted into English, they said.)

The Embassy spokesman said that the letterhead definitely pointed out that there was no connection with Washington, but rather with Stockholm.

THE GERMAN VERSION

The letter is one of the documents the German Government says was found in the archives of the Polish foreign office after the conquest of that country.

The Germans claim that in the letter Count Potocki reports an alleged interview he had with Ambassador William C. Bullitt, in which the American diplomat is supposed to have said:

"If war were to break out, we certainly would not participate in the beginning, but we will in the finish."

Count Potocki several days ago denied the interview in its entirety.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In addition, Mr. President, I have before me an article from the same newspaper of this morning entitled "Inquiry Into Kennedy and Bullitt Talks Asked." This article is by Mr. Chesly Manly. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of April 2, 1940]

INQUIRY INTO KENNEDY AND BULLITT TALKS ASKED

(By Chesly Manly)

Demands for a congressional investigation of war-mongering statements attributed to American ambassadors by the German White Book, published last Friday, were made in both the Senate and the House yesterday.

There were signs of a gathering storm as Members of Congress on and off the Senate and House floors compiled their own "White Books" of official public statements by President Roosevelt, Secretary of State Hull, and other administration officials in support of their contention that there is no reason to doubt the authenticity of the German documents.

REYNOLDS ASKS PROBE

The German White Book, based upon purported Polish records seized after the fall of Warsaw, quoted William C. Bullitt, Ambassador to France, and Joseph P. Kennedy, Ambassador to Great Britain, as telling Polish diplomats in 1939 that the United States would participate with its financial and material resources on the side of the British and French Empires in the event of war in Europe.

Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, Democrat, of North Carolina, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, demanded in a Senate speech that the committee investigate the conversations and activities of Bullitt and Kennedy, and that Bullitt, who is in this country, be summoned before he catches an airplane for Europe.

HOPES BULLITT WON'T FLY

Senator REYNOLDS plans to introduce a resolution today calling for Bullitt's appearance before the Foreign Relations Committee, and on Wednesday, the committee's next meeting date, he will demand a vote on the resolution. He said he hoped Bullitt in the meantime would not fly away.

In the House yesterday Representative HAMILTON FISH (Republican), of New York, ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, introduced a resolution calling for the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the authenticity of the German White Book.

OFFER OF AID RECALLED

Senator REYNOLDS, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee, was present at the famous White House conference during the investigation of the French airplane scandal in January 1939, when President Roosevelt was quoted as telling Senators the United States would give all possible assistance "short of war" to England and France in the event of a conflict between the Allied Empires and Germany. The President told the Senators at that conference that "our first line of defense is in France."

"The most deplorable fact about this matter," said Senator REYNOLDS in his speech yesterday, "is that even if the documents published in the German white paper are branded as forgeries, or possibly proved to be forgeries, any man can say, and many are already saying, that these interviews or alleged interviews sound mighty like a lot of things we have heard over the radio from many people in high office from time to time. That cannot be denied."

QUOTES F. D. SPEECH

REYNOLDS then quoted from President Roosevelt's Chicago bridge speech of October 3, 1937, in which he proposed concerted international action to "quarantine" aggressor nations, the following:

"The peace-loving nations must make a concerted effort in opposition to those violations of treaties and those ignorings of humane instincts which today are creating a state of international anarchy and instability from which there is no escape through mere isolation or neutrality."

"That statement," said Senator REYNOLDS, "was a clear and precise expression of opinion that the United States cannot escape involvement in a European controversy through isolation or neutrality."

WOULD CALL WELLES

While the Foreign Relations Committee is inquiring into the utterances attributed to Bullitt and Kennedy, REYNOLDS told the Senate, it would be well to call Sumner Welles, Under Secretary of State, who returned last week from a survey of the European war situation at President Roosevelt's request.

"The American people are extremely desirous of ascertaining from Mr. Welles personally where he went, with whom he talked, what he said, and what was said to him," REYNOLDS declared. "If we must have a house in Europe, I insist that we have a glass house in order that all may see and all may know what is going on. We want no secret diplomacy now."

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in reference to this all-important matter in which the American people are interested at this time, I have another article entitled "White Book Forged? Prove It, Nazis Say. Documents Offered for Experts' Inspection."

My humble opinion is that, instead of leaving this all-important matter to the German Government to prove the truth of it, we should attempt to prove the falsity thereof, particularly in view of the fact that the papers from the White Book charge that our representatives have encouraged the present war in Europe.

I ask unanimous consent that this particular article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of April 2, 1940]

WHITE BOOK FORGED?—PROVE IT, NAZIS SAY—DOCUMENTS OFFERED FOR EXPERTS' INSPECTION

(By Dana Schmidt)

BERLIN, April 1.—The German press today challenged William C. Bullitt, American Ambassador to France, to make a convincing defense against allegations in an official Nazi White Book on Friday that he engaged in war machinations against Germany.

The press centered its attacks upon Bullitt and emphasized criticism of President Roosevelt in the United States in connection with the White Book allegations but, for the most part, refrained from fresh attacks on Joseph P. Kennedy, United States Ambassador to London, also named in the charges.

ACTIVITIES CALLED CRIMINAL

Diplomatische Politische Korrespondenz, organ of the foreign office, asserted that the activities of American diplomatic representatives in Europe as alleged in the White Book have been "dangerous and even criminal."

The Frankfurter Zeitung ridiculed Bullitt's denial of the White Book charges, purporting to be based in diplomatic papers found in Polish archives in Warsaw after the German occupation, as "entirely unconvincing."

"If Bullitt wants to justify himself * * * he must either prove that the Polish documents are forgeries or that two Polish Ambassadors lied in their reports," the newspaper said.

UNQUESTIONABLY GENUINE

"He has not even attempted to prove a forgery and he cannot do so because they (the documents) unquestionably are genuine and available for examination by any foreign expert.

"If, however, he should accuse the Polish diplomats of reporting falsely, it will be difficult to find a plausible explanation of why two Polish diplomats in two places independently made the same false report."

Referring to a statement by Count Jerzy Potocki, Polish Ambassador to Washington, denying that he ever held any conversation at the American Embassy in Paris regarding United States participation in the war, the Frankfurter Zeitung said the White Book spoke only of conversations held in Washington.

The Deutsche Allegemeine Zeitung said the White Book documents proved that American diplomats "approved and encouraged" British claims to authority over the European continent.

The British claims are being prosecuted now, the newspaper adds, by the Allies' decision to increase pressure against the Scandinavians in an intensification of economic warfare.

"Norway is to lose sovereignty over shipping in her own waters," the Allegemeine Zeitung said. "The Swedes may no longer sell ore or the Rumanians oil to Germany. One sees what it means. This island (England) demands cession of sovereignty and a decision between peace and war from the peoples of the continent."

Mr. REYNOLDS. I likewise clipped from the columns of the Public Forum of the Washington Post of today a letter from the pen of Mr. Gilbert Carter, dated Washington, March 29, 1940, under the heading "Mr. Welles' Secret." Mr. Carter says to the editor:

SIR: Why the secrecy? What is behind Sumner Welles' trip to Europe and his very, very secret conference with Roosevelt?

In other words, Mr. President, this gentleman is merely voicing the opinion of millions of others who are desirous of knowing the reasons for the mission, what was accomplished, what was said, and what was done.

I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD as this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of April 2, 1940]

MR. WELLES' SECRET

To the EDITOR OF THE POST.

SIR: Why the secrecy? What is behind Sumner Welles' trip to Europe and his very, very secret conference with Roosevelt? All this shady business makes decent people wonder. The American people rightly suspect the war moves of the administration of "national unity"; that is, of the Rooseveltians, the Garnercrats, and the Republicans.

The President insists that all talk about the administration planning to involve the United States in war is "twaddle." Yet if peace were the motive behind Under Secretary Welles' visit to the warring powers, why in the world doesn't Mr. Roosevelt come right out and let the American people know what is going on? Doesn't he trust us? Can he be afraid of the fact that this "unhealthy" talk of peace might start getting around and subvert people's minds?

The American men and women don't want any part in the bloody mess that is developing "over there." We want to stay "over here." Why is the President ashamed to assure us in words and action that our boys will stay over here?

GILBERT CARTER.

WASHINGTON, March 29.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, the Senator appreciates that Mr. Welles is only an agent of the Government, and probably went abroad under orders and instructions from high administrative authority.

Mr. REYNOLDS. As a matter of fact, I mentioned that fact yesterday preliminarily in my remarks to this body.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know what Mr. Welles' disposition is in this matter, or whether he would like to talk or not. However, I am sure that if those under whom he worked were to ask him to talk he would do so, and if they asked him not to talk he would not do so. While the criticism might be proper in some respects, I do not think Mr. Welles ought to be criticized, because he is probably acting under instructions from others.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am very happy, indeed, to have the Senator make the observations he has made, for I am certainly not desirous of being placed in the position of criticizing Mr. Welles. So far as I am concerned, I am extremely fond of Mr. Welles personally. I think he is an exceptionally fine man. He is a career diplomat in the Department of State; and I consider Mr. Welles not only an authority upon Latin American matters but an authority upon world affairs. I have implicit confidence in him. The only reason why I take occasion to mention his name is that I have received innumerable inquiries by way of letters and telegrams, not only from my constituents in North Carolina but from virtually every State in the Union, in which the people voice the request that Mr. Welles advise the American people as to his mission. They recognize that this is a critical time in world affairs, and they feel that they should be acquainted with what is going on in Europe, in order that they may at least endeavor to ascertain for themselves whether or not there is any probability of our becoming involved in the unfortunate affairs of Europe today.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the very fair position the Senator is taking in reference to Mr. Welles. All of us must realize that Mr. Welles was simply acting under orders—perhaps "instructions" would be the better word—which he received from those who sent him; and that while Mr. Welles must necessarily be drawn into the argument because he was the emissary, what he did, or what he did not do, or what he should say or should not say, is not up to Mr. Welles. It is up to others.

I rise only for the purpose of pointing out that fact, because Mr. Welles is put in a rather unfair position. After all, he is not in charge of our foreign affairs. He is only a helper. Therefore he must be guided by the restrictions and instructions thrown around the particular work which he has been asked to perform.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator very much. I very thoroughly realize what the Senator says; and I am sure that after my explanation the senior Senator from Maryland will not for a moment construe my remarks as criticism of Mr. Welles. I like Mr. Welles very much. I have seen him on several occasions. As a matter of fact, I happened to be with him in Buenos Aires 2 or 3 years ago, when a peace conference was held there. I should not even employ the name of Mr. Welles but for the fact that in speaking of one whom we sent to Europe it is necessary for me to designate that individual by employing his name.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. This is not the time nor the place for discussing the subject at length, but I am sure that all who know Mr. Welles look upon him as one of the most efficient men we have had in the State Department during our time. I repeat that I rise not to take issue with what the Senator is saying, for his viewpoint so far as Mr. Welles is concerned is the same as my own, but to point out that the critics of Mr. Welles are sometimes a little unfair to him, unintentionally, in singling him out. After all, he has done no more than he was instructed to do; and I am sure he has done it very well, whatever his instructions were.

Mr. REYNOLDS. He is a fine career diplomat in the State Department, who carried out his mission according to his instructions.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am always entertained by the Senator from North Carolina in the field of international affairs.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am very grateful to my friend for his compliment, which I am sure is undeserved.

Mr. CONNALLY. On account of his wide travel and his contacts with foreign countries, foreign dignitaries, and our Diplomatic Service abroad, I have a high respect for his opinions.

However, the Senator must realize that at this time, of all times since the World War began, the foreign relations of the United States are in a more or less delicate posture, charged with possibilities, dangers, threats, and ominious rumblings of war. The Senator from North Carolina must realize that under the Constitution the President of the United States is charged with the conduct of our foreign affairs, except in those particulars in which the Senate shares that responsibility. To me, Mr. Welles, Mr. Bullitt, and Mr. Kennedy are mere personalities. I know them, but I have no ties that bind me to their cause. They are merely individuals. They are only names.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The important thing is that they are servants of the President of the United States.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Quite so; and representatives of the State Department.

Mr. CONNALLY. The President may dismiss them at his will. He appoints them, and he may dismiss them. To me they are just like a man's arm. They are supposed to do the bidding of the brain. They may talk too much—and if they talk at all, they probably talk too much. [Laughter.] Does not the Senator think that this is a matter which ought to be trusted to the discretion and wisdom of the President of the United States? If these men have done anything they should not have done, does not the President know how to discipline employees of the State Department and ambassadors, as well as any other employees in the Federal service? I think we ought to be very cautious about interjecting the Senate, or a committee, or anyone else into these activities at this time.

Secretary Hull, of course, is their chief, and over him is the President of the United States. I am willing to rely upon the patriotism, wisdom, and judgment of Secretary of State Hull and the President of the United States in this critical time when the slightest spark might ignite a train of dangers which would bring tragedy to the people of the United States. I know that the Senator's purpose is benevolent, and of the highest; but sometimes we acquire a warped aspect. When American citizens remain abroad too long—as some diplomats no doubt do—and when Senators go abroad and form so many contacts, form so much admiration for foreign countries and foreign institutions, and receive so much entertainment in embassies and foreign chancelleries, they sometimes lose their perspective as to the relationship of the United States to those countries. I would hoist before the mad charge of the Senator from North Carolina at least a yellow light—not necessarily a red light to stop him, but a caution light, to cause him to hesitate on the brink of what might be a very serious accident, a collision with some other force which might bring us trouble. I make this suggestion to the Senator in all kindness, and as a brother member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I appreciate that immensely, and I am delighted to have had the observations of my distinguished friend the junior Senator from Texas, for whom I have the deepest affection and the greatest admiration. However, I must disagree with my friend that we are in a peculiarly delicate situation; but if we are in a peculiarly dangerous and delicate situation it is attributable to ourselves and to nobody else.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again? I do not want to trespass upon his time.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says if we are in a delicate situation it is because of something we have done. Did the United States start the war in Europe? Did we unleash the engines of death and destruction? Did we drop any bombs?

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is the question propounded by the White Book.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no. Have we dropped any bombs on civilian populations; have we submarined any ships at sea? Have we murdered any neutral citizens upon the high seas? Did the United States conspire and intrigue to wipe out nationalities and governments and overturn chancelleries?

I submit to the Senator—and I hold out the yellow light to him because I have esteem for him and consideration for him and great admiration for his public service now and I hope in the future——

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. That I do not think this is a boy's job. We cannot probe into the secrecies of international conversations around tea tables and in smoking rooms and in cocktail lounges. I do not want to go into places of that kind. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will admonish occupants of the galleries that demonstrations of any character are forbidden by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, it seems to me that the President of the United States can be trusted. Whatever the President's motive in sending Mr. Welles to Europe—and I do not know the details; I do not know what Mr. Welles found out, if anything—undoubtedly the motive was a good one. The President thought that perhaps he might find an attitude of mind or facts or situations which might offer some hope for peace in the world, and if there can be in the breast of a statesman a holier and nobler impulse than to bring peace to a war-torn and bleeding world I do not know what it is. Let us let the President alone.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator very much. I am particularly grateful for his having suggested the yellow light, but what I want is a red light against war.

It is true that we have not dismembered any of the nations of the earth; it is true that we have not invaded any of the countries of Europe or Asia. It is likewise true that we have not dropped any bombs in Germany, or in old Poland, or in Czechoslovakia, or Austria; but the probabilities are that millions of our bombs will be dropped there, because we are the arsenal of the world, and we are manufacturing bombs and selling them to anybody who can come and get them.

It was alleged, I recall very distinctly and definitely, when we were discussing the proposed loan or an additional loan of ten or twenty million dollars to Finland that the Finns were protesting because the Russians, they said, were dropping bombs upon their civilian population, bombs that had been bought from the United States of America.

I mention the name of Mr. Welles because his name happens to be Welles, and I merely make reference to the matter because I happen to know that the American people are desirous of knowing with whom Mr. Welles talked, where he talked, what he said, and what was said to him. I rather feel the American people are entitled to know something about his conversations; in other words, to ascertain whether or not the situation for us involves any seriousness.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly; I am always happy to yield to our distinguished leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to state that the time of the Senator from North Carolina, he having yielded so much of his own time, has expired.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I did not know the debate was limited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, debate is limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has time on the bill, has he not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands not, under the agreement.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am sorry I have not more time, but surely I may have time to insert in the RECORD a portion of an article by Gen. Hugh Johnson from the columns of the Washington Daily News of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

There is—but what's the use? It is all stale. Bill Bullitt has a little less dough and a little more sense, but he is not exactly qualified to steer us away from war as Ambassador to his beloved France. You can bet that the official repudiations of any such pro-war opinion are the unvarnished truth so far as Secretary Hull is concerned.

But some of the President's diplomatic glamour boys short-circuit Mr. Hull. He didn't know anything about the "quarantine the aggressors" in the President's famous Chicago outburst until it was spoken. Mr. Bullitt suggested that startling announcement of an unsuspected American international policy without consulting the Secretary.

Mr. Bullitt is an unpredictable, militant, skyrockety, and amateur statesman who likes to do astonishing things. If you don't believe that, you should read the Great American novel he once wrote—It's Not Done. It could still sell if it were advertised along with the rupture cures and the physical-culture courses in the pulp magazines under the title: "What a Young Bride Ought to Know." It blasted Philadelphia society in its time, but Bill had a lot of fun, like a boy squirting turpentine through the bars of a cage full of wildcats. He is still having a lot of fun, but it would be safer for this country if he were doing it in Philadelphia and not as Ambassador to France in a warring world.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I now send to the desk a resolution which, if adopted, will require the appearance of Mr. Welles and Mr. Bullitt before the Foreign Relations Committee, together with a copy of their speeches made since they have been in office. I particularly ask the State Department to hasten to send now a copy of the speech which Mr. Bullitt made at Bordeaux, France, last year, which I am desirous of reading to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 252) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to transmit to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate as soon as practicable full information with respect to the reasons for the recent visit to Europe of the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Welles, and to request Mr. Welles to present to such committee his views with respect to the purposes and accomplishments of such visit, if compatible with the public interest.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of State is also requested to transmit to such committee as soon as practicable full and complete information with respect to the so-called White Book recently published by the German Government, relating to alledged diplomatic correspondence between the Government of the United States and Poland, and copies of all speeches made by the Ambassador to France, Mr. Bullitt, the Ambassador to the Court of St. James, Mr. Kennedy, and the Minister to Canada, Mr. Cromwell, during their tenure in such offices.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of State is requested to inform such committee with respect to the circumstances surrounding the recent speech at Bordeaux, France, of the Ambassador to France, Mr. Bullitt, and to request Mr. Bullitt to present to such committee his views with respect to the so-called White Book published by the German Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I rise to discuss the pending amendment, but, before entering upon a discussion of the amendment, I wish to suggest to my friend from North Carolina what I had intended to say if he had had time to yield.

The President, in the selection of Mr. Welles to make a journey to Europe and ascertain facts, indicated at that time, and so did the Secretary of State, that he was carrying no proposal to Europe and it was not contemplated that he would bring back any proposal. I assumed—and the newspapers carried the assumption, I think, accurately—that he was to ascertain what information he could as to attitudes, situations, and reactions, so that it might be available to the President in the event it might appear that there was any hope for peace.

Mr. Welles is not the only man who has been sent abroad, and this is not the first time the President of the United States has ever sent abroad an agent as his personal representative to ascertain something about international conditions. When Mr. Welles departed it was stated by everyone in authority that he carried no proposals and that he was not expected to bring back any proposals. When he returned it was stated by him and by the President and by the Secretary of State, as I recall, that he brought back no proposals and took none with him.

I think we all must give full credit to the sincerity, integrity, and good faith of the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and Mr. Welles, and I think that we must take what they have said about it at face value. Doing this, it seems to me it would be beyond the bounds of propriety or necessity for us to undertake to listen in by remote control or by any other method to the conversations which transpired between Mr. Welles and those with whom he had interviews, because the Senator knows how easy it is for parts of sentences or of suggestions which are uttered in the midst of a give-and-take conversation between men of importance to be misinterpreted and how readily somebody may hang a hat on a peg and give an interpretation for which there is no legitimate basis. Recognizing the good faith of the Senator, for whom, as he knows, I have an affectionate regard not only as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee but as a Member of the Senate and as my personal friend——

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am deeply grateful for the Senator's kind words.

Mr. BARKLEY. I believe that we will not serve our country or the cause of peace by undertaking to inject our ears and our eyes into these private conversations, however desirable we might think it, for our own information, to know everything that happened. We must trust some of these matters to our legal and diplomatic representatives. It seems to me that the best we can do now is to trust our own Government and those who are appointed to serve it.

Reference has been made here to the White Book which has been issued and which purports to represent some miraculous discoveries in the foreign office of the Polish Government. I happen to know Mr. Bullitt; I happen to know Mr. Kennedy. I have the greatest respect for them as citizens of the United States and for their disinterestedness in serving the Nation. It was my good fortune to converse with both these able diplomats before the war broke out in Europe. Long before the war broke out, even a year and a half ago or 2 years ago, everyone was on tiptoe, wondering whether, after all, there would be a war in Europe. These gentlemen, backed up by the Secretary of State, by the President of the United States, by the Ambassador accredited to the United States by Poland, have all categorically and unequivocally denied that the things purported to have been discovered in Warsaw have any basis or foundation whatever in truth.

I do not believe, and I am sure I am justified in my position, that the Senator from North Carolina, or any other

Senator, or the American people for that matter, would give as much credence to a so-called White Book, which may or may not be a very clever form of propaganda, as they would give and ought to give, to the Secretary of State, to our Ambassadors to the respective countries, and to the Ambassador of the destroyed Polish Government to the United States. I think the Senator and all of us ought to give full credence to our own representatives and not, even innocently or unintentionally or even to serve a good public purpose, try to put them in an embarrassing situation rather than to credit propaganda, if that is what it is—and there are many who believe that it is—issued by the German Government alleging certain discoveries supposed to have been made in the foreign office at Warsaw. I wonder if my friend does not agree with me upon that broad statement of our policy?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I should like to make a frank statement. The Senator has stated that the President, no doubt through the State Department, sent Mr. Welles to Europe to ascertain the definite situation and as to whether or not there was any chance of peace in which the President and all of us are entirely and deeply interested, because the whole world is desirous of peace. We all realize that if military operations in the European war become intensified, millions of men will be killed, and after the war is over there will simply be a repetition of what took place 25 years ago. It was laudable and commendable of the President of the United States to send to Europe our very excellent representative of the Department of State, Mr. Welles, because in him I have implicit confidence.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, let me add what I intended to say originally—that President Wilson sent Colonel House abroad. Whether or not Colonel House rendered service is a matter about which men may disagree.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is a matter for question.

Mr. BARKLEY. He was sent in the interest of peace. From time to time since then not only President Roosevelt but one or two of his predecessors sent Mr. Norman H. Davis—who was frequently referred to in the newspapers as "our roving ambassador"—to ascertain conditions in Europe, and report to the Government of the United States. I mention these men merely to illustrate the fact that, without regard to party or administration, men in whom the President had confidence have been dispatched abroad to bring back to him intimate information and a coordinated set of facts which probably no one person designated for a particular country would be able to bring to him.

Mr. REYNOLDS. As the Senator states, Colonel House was sent to Europe, and that was prior to our entrance into the World War on April 6, 1917. As the Senator knows, many persons allege and contend that as a matter of fact Colonel House's tour of and sojourn in Europe really contributed to a large extent to our eventual involvement in the war, and much criticism has been aimed in that direction.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a matter about which differences of opinion exist.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I say now that if we are to send a Colonel House to Europe in the form of Mr. Welles, as I stated yesterday, that house should be a glass house. We should be able to look into it and see what is going on. I do not think this is any time for secret diplomacy, because the American people are desirous of ascertaining the truth of everything and knowing the true facts.

The Senator a moment ago mentioned the fact that our distinguished friend Mr. Welles was sent to Europe for the purpose of ascertaining the attitude of the Europeans; and that is one thing I should like to find out from Mr. Welles. For instance, we know that he talked with Mussolini; we know that he talked with Hitler; we know that he talked with the Minister of War of France, and that he talked with Mr. Chamberlain, the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Only yesterday I read in a newspaper or magazine an article to the effect that the British people were becoming terribly peeved with the American people; that they were getting "sore" because we had not gotten into this controversy. I do not think the British people have any right to get "sore" with us, because we are doing everything we possibly can for them short of war; short of sending men over there to handle the guns which we manufacture for them. I cannot for the life of me believe that any people upon the face of the earth would be so thoroughly ungrateful as to criticize the American people at this time for not sending our sons over there to die on their soil to save their Empire, at a time when we are doing everything in the world we can for them; and I, for one, should like to be privileged to direct an inquiry to Mr. Welles as to whether that is true or whether it is propaganda.

I cannot help believing that what I read in the newspaper yesterday, to the effect that the British were getting peeved with us and "sore" with us because we did not send men over there to handle the guns with which we provided them, is mere propaganda to make us mad with the British; and for one thing, of many, I should like to ask Mr. Welles whether or not it is true that the British are "sore" or peeved or angry with us because we have not done that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt very much if Mr. Welles could answer a question of that sort.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I think he probably could.

Mr. BARKLEY. He was in London only a day or two, as I understand, and it would have been impossible for anybody in London or in England in a day or in a week to find out whether the British people were "sore" with us.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I do not know about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Although I did not see the article referred to, I agree with the Senator that in all probability it is propaganda to arouse some friction between the English people and our people; but I am not prepared to believe, and I do not believe, that the English people or the French people are taking any umbrage against the United States or our people because we have not participated and do not propose to participate in the war.

While the Senator may not agree with me, I do not want to take up further time on this subject. I desire to discuss the pending amendment to the joint resolution. How much more time have I?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The present occupant of the chair is advised that the Senator from Kentucky has 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the shortness of time, I am going to have to desist from this discussion.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I did not take my time on the joint resolution a moment ago, so I shall be glad to delegate that time to our distinguished leader——

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Because I want to discuss this matter with him. He is interested, just as I am, in the preservation of the American people.

Mr. BARKLEY. No time on the joint resolution is available while the amendment is pending. Twenty minutes to each Senator is all that is available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has previously ruled that under the unanimous-consent agreement the discussion now is limited to 20 minutes to each Senator on the amendment. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I ask unanimous consent that we be privileged to continue our discussion.

Mr. BARKLEY. I object.

Mr. McNARY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that he and the Senator from Kentucky be privileged to continue their discussion.

Mr. BARKLEY. I myself object to that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. It looks as though I am overruled, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I had not intended to consume so much of my 20 minutes on the international situation, which, of course, we may debate from time to time as long as the war lasts, but I did want to comment very briefly on the pending amendment.

I come from a coal-producing State. Kentucky is one of the outstanding producers of coal in the United States. It also is a great producer of oil. We produce in my State more cattle than are produced in many of the States throughout the West. I think Kentucky's production of cattle is greater than that of Wyoming or Idaho or Utah or Arizona or New Mexico or Colorado or Washington or Oregon. So I speak not only as in part a representative of coal and oil but likewise of cattle. We have great forests, and we also produce a large amount of lumber.

The amendment now offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] proposes to freeze the so-called excise taxes on coal, oil, copper, and lumber. All of us who were here in 1932, when these taxes on coal and oil and lumber and copper were placed in the revenue bill, realize, as we did then, that they were in effect tariffs. They effected a tax upon foreign coal and copper and lumber and oil coming into the United States. Of course, the tax was levied after the product got into the United States, but it was not levied on domestic production, and it would not have been levied on these products if they had not come in as imports, so it was, in effect, a tariff on these commodities.

With respect to the question of oil, we have entered into a trade agreement with Venezuela by which the tariff or tax has been reduced from one-half cent a gallon to one-quarter cent a gallon. The amount of oil that comes in under that trade agreement is very small in relation to our own production, and that reduction from one-half to one-quarter of a cent applies only to that part of any importation which would amount to no more than 5 percent of the product of our domestic refiners, and if at any time the importation goes above 5 percent the one-half-cent tax applies, so the reduction in the tariff or tax on oil is applicable only to a small quantity of oil coming in.

The great bulk of the oil which comes in is used for fuel oil and for asphalt. It does not really compete with gasoline-bearing oils produced in the United States.

As the result of the agreement between the United States and Venezuela we have been given concessions on wheat flour, lard, and canned fruits and vegetables, which are, of course, agricultural, together with some agricultural implements which that country buys from us. So that, in return for a reduction of one-quarter of a cent a gallon on oil from Venezuela, we have been given concessions upon many of our agricultural products and the products of our factories.

As to coal, since the agreement with Canada was entered into we have increased our exports of coal to Canada by more than 38 percent. Nearly all the coal we export goes to Canada. A tax was levied by Canada of 3 percent, I believe, under a law of their own, and under our agreement with Canada they remitted that 3-percent tax on coal which we ship into Canada, with the result that under the trade agreement we have increased our exports of coal to Canada by more than 38 percent. That increase of 38 percent in the exportation of coal has certainly meant a better market for the coal producers of Kentucky, and West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, and other States. A large part of the exportation is made up of bituminous coal, but some of it consists of anthracite, which is produced almost altogether in Pennsylvania. So no one interested in the production of oil or coal need be afraid of the result of the agreements, and nothing has occurred under the agreements which has yet, or by any flight of the imagination could, injure the producers of coal or oil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am sorry I cannot go into a discussion of lumber and copper, and I will confine myself to one sentence. In view of our present situation, it seems to me illogical and unwise to pick out four or five among thousands of articles upon the tariff list and ask that they be frozen so that they cannot even be dealt with by agreements. For these reasons, I hope the pending amendment will be defeated.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly in support of the substitute amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

I am opposed to any reciprocal-trade policy which purports to affect the excise tax on foreign-produced copper. The excise taxes which have been discussed were expressly enacted in 1932 to prevent the utter demoralization of the domestic copper industry through the flooding of our market with peon-produced foreign copper. To permit any substantial modification of these taxes in any proposed reciprocal trade agreement policy would certainly have disastrous effects on all western mining States.

Copper mining is one of the Nation's important industries, and fluctuations in the production of copper seriously affect the country's general welfare. Nearly a dozen States in the Union, including Montana, contain extensive and valuable deposits of this metal. The mining and smelting of copper constitutes one of our important western activities and is one of the main sources of the Nation's wealth and prosperity. All wealth, of course, comes from the ground, and for many years these western mining States have been pouring out the wealth from their mines and spreading it across the country, benefiting the whole Nation, not merely the States producing it.

The principal copper-producing States of the Union are Arizona, Utah, Montana, Nevada, Michigan, New Mexico, Alaska, Colorado, California, and Idaho. There are a few other States producing copper, but their output is not important. Periodic curtailment of production and consequent unemployment in these mining States causes much anxiety and distress. Like other industries in the country, we have been experiencing treacherous fluctuations in the market for copper ever since the onset of the depression.

During the last World War we enjoyed unusual prosperity in the copper industry. We had high prices for the metal and a constantly expanding market. Unfortunately, the high prices of copper during the last World War, and practically right up to 1930, excited the cupidity of capital and led to an international movement to discover and develop copper deposits in other sections of the world. As a result, large copper mines have been developed in Canada, South America, and South Africa.

For nearly 80 years prior to 1930 the United States dominated the world copper industry. During that period the United States had produced more than half the world's new copper. Since 1930, however, and coincident with the development of foreign copper production, we have witnessed a constantly decreasing proportion of production in the United States. As a result of this development we have lost our foreign markets for copper, because we could not compete with the low-cost production of foreign copper mines. In this country we have continued to maintain high wages and good working conditions. Certainly, in the State of Montana, it would be absolutely impossible to compete, because our mines are deeper than usual and, of course, more costly to operate.

American capital, to a large degree, is invested in these foreign properties, just as is the case in the sugar industry in Cuba. For example, American corporations control the large copper operations in Chile, and, as I pointed out yesterday, long before the depression we were importing copper into this country from Chile, where it could be produced and landed in New York at much less than the cost of production in this country. For the 11 years 1922–32 the Anaconda Co. obtained 50.3 percent of its production within the United States and 49.7 percent from abroad. During the 4 years 1929–32 this company mined only 44.7 percent of its total output in this country and imported from Chile and Mexico 55.3 percent. I understand that the Kennecott Copper Co. also brings into this country a large portion of its total output. Reports of the Kennecott's copper production for the year 1932 disclosed that 44.5 percent of its total production was mined in Chile and 55.5 percent within this country.

As a result of these conditions, and in the absence of tariff protection, copper production in this country dropped seriously, and in the early part of the depression the price of copper went as low as 5 cents a pound. It will be seen, therefore, that the excise tax was absolutely necessary to prevent a complete demoralization of the American copper industry.

This industry represents an enormous investment, and makes a vital contribution to American industrial activity. The money expended by copper producers and fabricators for material and supplies affects practically every State in the Union. The greatest tonnage of copper production is in the far West, whereas the fabricating plants are in the Middle West and East. It will therefore be seen that railroad transportation is a tremendous beneficiary of this industry. In fact, copper is a very vital factor to American railroads. The production and fabrication of copper is also an important item in the labor market.

The following figures will show the effect of copper in our American economy:

For each ton of copper produced in 1937:

a. $96.50 was paid out in wages.

b. $79.57 was paid out in purchases from other industries.

c. $8.29 was paid out in Federal taxes.

d. $10.39 was paid out in State and local taxes.

e. $27.99 was paid out in freight.

The point I wish to make is that there is a serious danger that, through the repeal or substantial modification of these excise taxes, we may materially injure this great American industry, and bring on a serious condition of unemployment and business stagnation in the country. If these excise taxes are not protected in this legislation, and subsequent trade treaties should modify them and permit the flooding of the American market with foreign copper, many of the American mines will be compelled to suspend operations. Such a result would have serious consequences. In addition to the unemployment which would follow, the closed mines would probably be destroyed, because if they were allowed to fill with water, the underground workings would be so affected, and it would be so expensive to dewater them, that they would probably never be reopened.

Since 1935, as a result of the stimulation of business brought on by various governmental policies of the administration, the copper industry has enjoyed greatly improved conditions. Of course, there is no possibility of ever reaching our former position in the copper industry. We will never again occupy a dominant position in supplying copper to the world. Because of this loss of foreign markets, it is now necessary to curtail mining operations in this country in order to avoid overproduction. If, however, we should witness any substantial importation of copper into this country, it would be ruinous to the industry.

I think our reciprocal-trade policies should be devised so as not to threaten the destruction of any American industry. I am in favor of a trade-treaty system which will not create deserted villages, blighted areas, unemployment, and poverty in any section of the country. A trade-treaty system which would sacrifice American copper and close the great copper mines of Montana and other Western States, throwing thousands of workers out of employment and bankrupting communities, would seem to me to be a reckless and indefensible policy. There cannot be the slightest doubt that such a result would follow any interference with these excise taxes.

To show the dangers which may come from this situation, I wish to point out that the trade agreements which have been entered into with Great Britain, Belgium, and Canada contain no concessions affecting excise taxes. If we should now recognize the power in the Executive to reduce these taxes as a concession to some foreign copper-producing country like Chile, a similar reduction, through the most-favored-nation principle, will thereupon result to all the other large copper-producing nations with which we have been dealing. This would be a free gift to Great Britain, Canada, and Belgium and we would get nothing in return. Such a development would mean immediate reductions in wages, and eventually widespread unemployment and economic distress in the copper-producing States. We are not merely speculating that this would be the result—we know it from past experiences. As I have before pointed out, even in the year 1929, when this country was enjoying its highest degree of prosperity, the mines in the Western States were seriously affected. Many of them closed completely as a result of the flooding of this country with cheaply produced copper from South America. The excise tax saved the situation then and should now be preserved, if we desire to maintain prosperous conditions and employment in this country.

I think it would be a dangerous mistake to interfere with these taxes, and I therefore intend to vote for the amendment presented by the distinguished junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have a few observations to make.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Vermont, but I should prefer not to have the Senator make that suggestion. It is my intention to speak very briefly.

If I correctly understood the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, and his modification thereof made this morning, the latter contemplates that trade agreements shall not in any way affect excise duties that may hereafter be placed upon commodities by Congress. That is a considerable expansion of the amendment proposed yesterday, with which I am in full accord.

Mr. President, I took quite an active interest in the debate a few years ago when the excise bill was before Congress and treated as a part of the revenue bill. At that time we incorporated coal, copper, oil, and lumber. I need not recite again, as I did yesterday, the assurance we had from the able chairman of the Finance Committee that these duties would not be disturbed, but unfortunately for that great industry which means so much to the northwestern section of the country these duties were disturbed.

Mr. President, in view of the statements and assurances of the chairman of the Finance Committee I am particularly interested in the pending amendment. The lumber industry has been badly injured by what has been done by the State Department in violating the excise duty which it enjoyed. That industry is out of the picture. But I do not want to see copper, oil, and coal suffer the same penalty and the same injury that was inflicted upon lumber. Therefore, in that sense, my interest is altruistic.

Mr. President, I like the modification of the amendment and its enlargement, as suggested by the able Senator from Nevada. It would permit Congress in the future to function according to the authority given it by the Constitution. If Congress should in the future place an excise duty on dairy products, or poultry products, or any other products of the United States the State Department could not destroy that protection. Congress would be permitted to operate without the interference of the trade agreements. I think that is the purpose of the amendment. In my opinion, it is very commendable and should receive the support of those Members of the Senate who today probably are not conscious of the fact that something may occur to them inside the next year or so.

Mr. President, I have received a number of telegrams—other Senators also, of course, have received many telegrams—in connection with this matter, and I want to read one for the purpose of presenting in a very brief way the question of the depreciation of foreign currency. I received a telegram from a very prominent feed firm in Portland, Oreg. It is typical of many which I have received, and I shall read it. I do not want to burden the RECORD by reading an unnecessary number of quotations from telegrams and newspaper articles.

The telegram is dated April 1, and is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG.

Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Would appreciate your support of McCarran amendment to the Trade Agreement Act. With the very rapid decline of world currencies, some protection is absolutely essential. Thanks for your support of Pittman amendment.

A. E. ENGBRETSON,
Engbretson Seed Co.

A number of telegrams of similar import, which I have received from the Northwest States, could be read.

Mr. President, it was in November of last year that I addressed a letter to the Secretary of State calling his attention to the depreciation in foreign currencies and the effect it was having upon the commerce of the United States and upon our domestic production. That letter was written on the 6th of November. It was placed in the RECORD by our distinguished Democratic leader, the able Senator from Kentucky. In that letter I had this to say, and I shall read only a portion of it in order to come within the limitation of time which now surrounds me:

The most immediate effect of the war is a depreciation of foreign currency in relation to the American dollar. It will be noted that from December 1, 1938, to December 1, 1939—exactly a year—the British pound declined 17 percent in relation to the dollar; the French franc declined 66 percent from May 1936 to December 1939, in relation to the dollar; while the Canadian dollar has declined practically 12 percent from December 1 of last year until the same date this year.

Later in that letter I called to the attention of the able Secretary of State that there is a provision contained in the Trade Agreements Act under which, if there is a substantial reduction in the ratio of currencies a remedy is provided whereby we can either cancel the agreement or cause a modification and correction thereof.

The Secretary of State answered my letter on December 6. His answer was also placed in the RECORD by the able Senator from Kentucky, and follows my letter to which reference has just been made. The Secretary of State said:

The central point of your argument relates to the effects upon our foreign trade of recent wartime currency depreciation in Canada, Great Britain, and France. * * *

Your sole evidence of injury is the citation of a theory—that when one country depreciates its currency unit, another country, whose currency remains at the old level, inevitably finds its exports to the depreciated-currency country retarded and its imports from that country stimulated.

That was the theory under which the Secretary said I was laboring. He dismissed the matter last December.

Mr. President, I do not want to refer to this in the sense that "I told you so," because that expression is not always a happy one. But this morning I observed in the Washington Times-Herald an article, which also appeared in the Washington Post, and I think in other metropolitan newspapers, headed:

United States to curb import flood from Britain—menace presented by depreciated pound.

In that article the depreciation is shown to be precisely in percentage the same as that to which I called the attention of the Secretary of State back in November. Then it was a theory, and there was nothing substantial about it. The article continues—and I think I shall take time to read from it, as follows:

The United States Government will shortly take steps to protect American industry and commerce against a flood of British goods stimulated by the depreciated pound sterling, it was learned last night.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the entire article from the Times-Herald of April 2 printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of April 2, 1940]

UNITED STATES TO CURB IMPORT FLOOD FROM BRITAIN—MENACE PRESENTED BY DEPRECIATED POUND

(By Sandor S. Klein)

The United States Government will shortly take steps to protect American industry and commerce against a flood of British goods stimulated by the depreciated pound sterling, it was learned last night.

The first step in all likelihood will be taken this week, perhaps within the next 24 hours, in the form of an order by the Treasury to customs collectors to recognize the official rate for the pound in assessing duty on British goods arriving in this country.

CONTRAST IN RATES

The official rate ranges between $4.02½ and $4.03½ as against the free market or unofficial rates which during the last week has ranged between $3.44¾ and $3.71¼. The $3.44¾ was the lowest level for the pound since April 15, 1933.

Although the official rate is quoted in New York, American importers have been availing themselves of the lower free market price.

The result of the dual rates is that British exports to the United States have been stimulated sharply.

OFFICIALS ALARMED

The Treasury's anticipated action is an outgrowth of discussions with State Department officials who have been concerned over the effects of the depreciated pound, particularly because currency depreciation practices are barred by the tripartite monetary agreement and the escape clause of the United States-United Kingdom reciprocal-trade agreement.

The order to customs collectors will require them to make so-called interim assessments. This means that British goods will be assessed at the official rate. Later, if the importer can show that he purchased pounds at the free-market rate to pay for the goods, he will receive a refund based on an assessment at the lower unofficial rate.

The effect of an official rate assessment is expected to be somewhat similar to that of the countervailing or penalty duties imposed against German imports a year ago.

Mr. MCNARY. The rate with respect to Canadian money is not given, but I will state that the depreciation of Canadian money is greater now than it was when I addressed the letter to the Secretary of State last November. Then, as I think my letter stated, it was 12 percent, and now it is about 16½ percent.

Mr. President, I have in my hand a page from the United States News, published in Washington, the issue of April 5, a date which will soon arrive, from which I read:

A British pound sterling could be bought during the past week for less than $3.50 in American money. Not many months ago, nearly five American dollars were needed to buy one British pound.

In this drop in the price of the "free" sterling is seen one of the early effects of the war and also a hint of trade troubles that may lie ahead for the United States. The last time something like this happened, there started a train of events—declining commodity prices, declining security prices, declining foreign trade—that led eventually to the New Deal and its attempt to reverse the tide of deflation.

Mr. President, those are precisely the words I might have employed, in my letter to the Secretary of State last November.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from which I have just quoted be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the United States News of April 5, 1940]

THE THREAT OF "FREE" STERLING—BRITISH WAR MANEUVER THAT MAY CAUSE UNITED STATES TRADE TROUBLE—FALL IN PRICE OF THE POUND POINTS TO THE RESTRICTION OF MARKETS FOR AMERICA

A British pound sterling could be bought during the past week for less than $3.50 in American money. Not many months ago nearly five American dollars were needed to buy one British pound.

In this drop in the price of the "free" sterling is seen one of the early effects of the war and also a hint of trade troubles that may lie ahead for the United States. The last time something like this happened there started a train of events—declining commodity prices, declining security prices, declining foreign trade—that led eventually to the New Deal and its attempt to reverse the tide of deflation.

Does the new decline portend another cycle of currency wars and government controls?

Officials, closely watching the situation, hope not. They look at it in this way: The British, like the Germans, now have more than one kind of currency. They will release their official currency to pay for those American goods that the Government wants to buy. This currency is worth $4.02 to the pound. The "free" currency, because it will command fewer dollars, is going to make all other American goods extremely expensive to Britishers and will discourage their purchase. This means that the British are using their two kinds of money to discourage purchase in the United States of any but those goods the British Government wants for war purposes.

This is uncomfortable, but the point being watched most closely by Washington officials is the effect of the cheap "free" pound not on British purchases but on British sales of goods. This cheap pound can be used by foreigners to buy in Britain all but a limited list of British goods for which only foreign exchange can be used. The effect in this case is to enable many British products to compete more readily with American products in neutral markets.

Surface appearances suggest that the United States is caught in the middle—faced in Britain with the curtailment of markets for all but war goods and faced in foreign markets with competition of British goods made cheap by a cheap currency.

But the official attitude of this Government is wait and see. Not unless commodity prices in the United States fall more than they have fallen and not unless British competition for foreign markets is more intense than it has been will any steps in retaliation be taken. Yet here is an accepted sign that war is going to add to the problems of this country.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, probably later today or tomorrow, when we shall have no limitation of time, I intend to discuss my views of the general theory of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. I shall not be able to do so at this time. I only insist, in view of the precedent established by the Department of State, that we should take no chance of permitting any further reduction in the excise duties which Congress passed by an overwhelming vote. Even though the product in which I am most greatly interested is out and has been destroyed by a want of good faith on behalf of the administration, and in direct violation of the assurances given me by the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I still want to see these commodities protected; and I commend my friend from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] for expanding and enlarging the scope of his amendment to include anticipated injuries which, in my opinion, will follow if we continue the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act as a statute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LUCAS (when Mr. SLATTERY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SLATTERY] is unavoidably detained on public business. He has a pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. I am advised that if my colleague were present, he would vote "nay," and that if the senior Senator from Oklahoma were present and at liberty to vote he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. On this question, my colleague [Mr. RADCLIFFE] has a pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay." If the Senator from North Dakota were present, he would vote "yea." These Senators are necessarily detained.

Mr. MINTON. I announce the following pairs on this question:

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who would vote "nay"; and

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who would vote "nay."

I also announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] are detained on important public business.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is attending the funeral of the late Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, and is therefore necessarily absent.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are attending conferences in Government departments on matters pertaining to their respective States.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is unavoidably detained.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following pair on this question:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. If the Senator from Massachusetts were present, he would vote "yea." If the Senator from Virginia were present, he would vote "nay." The Senator from Massachusetts is necessarily detained.

Mr. CONNALLY. On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, we would vote "yea."

So Mr. McCARRAN's substitute amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] offered a substitute, and, therefore, it did not displace the original amendment. So the question recurs on the original amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada. [Putting the question.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to add the following:

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby declares that by reason of the state of war existing in Europe, the absolute control exercised by belligerents and certain other countries over their export and import trade, and the growing tendency of said belligerents and other countries to so control such trade to the detriment of American export and import trade, it is necessary to establish an Export-Import Control Board in order (1) to maintain for American producers a fair share of the world markets for agricultural commodities and other articles and materials; (2) to avoid as far as possible any effect on our domestic prices for such commodities, articles, and materials by reason of international prices fixed for similar commodities, articles, and materials by said belligerents and other countries; (3) to protect American consumers against unduly high prices for such imported commodities, articles, and materials; and (4) to protect American producers against the dumping of certain commodities, articles, and materials in the United States by belligerents or other nations seeking funds for the conduct of the war or for other purposes.

(b) There is hereby established an Export-Import Control Board (hereinafter referred to in this section as the "Board"), to be composed of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce, one of whom shall be appointed chairman by the President. A vacancy in the membership of the Board shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the Board, and shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(c) Whenever the Board, after investigation, finds (1) that any foreign country is exercising such control over its export and import trade, by reason of the existence of a state of war or otherwise, as to discriminate against American trade or commerce, and (2) that it is advisable, in order to effectuate the policies described in clauses (1) to (4) of subsection (a), to regulate and control our exports to and imports from any such country, the Board shall require every person exporting any articles or materials to or importing any articles or materials from any such country to register with the Board his name, or business name, principal place of business, and places of business in the United States, and a list of the articles or materials he exports or imports.

(d) Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $5. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Board shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $5.

(e) Licenses shall be issued by the Board to persons who have registered as herein provided, except in cases where the issuance of a license would, in the opinion of the Board, tend to defeat or nullify the policies described in clauses (1) to (4) of subsection (a), in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.

(f) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States to any foreign country specified in clause (1) of subsection (c), or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any such country, any articles or materials, without first having submitted to the Board the name of the purchaser and the terms of the sale, and having obtained a license therefor.

(g) The Board shall have power to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, experts, and employees as it deems necessary for the performance of its duties, but the compensation so fixed shall not exceed the compensation fixed under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, for comparable duties. The Board is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government. The members of the Board shall serve without additional compensation but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the exercise of the functions vested in the Board.

(h) The Board shall make a report of its activities to Congress on the first day of each regular session thereof, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress.

(i) The Board, under the direction and with the approval of the President, may, from time to time, promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

(j) Any person who violates any provision of this section or of any rule or regulation promulgated hereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, company, or association, each officer or director thereof participating in the violation shall be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

(k) For the purposes of this section, the term "United States," when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States and Territories, the insular possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia; and the term "person" includes a partnership, company, association, or corporation, as well as a natural person.

(l) There is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

(m) This section shall take effect upon the expiration of 60 days after the date of enactment of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, at the time the Neutrality Act was under consideration at the special session of Congress I offered an amendment designed, as I believed, to prevent the further distortion of the domestic economy of this country as a result of the impact of war abroad. That amendment was much more comprehensive than this one. It was mandatory in its provisions, and would have required the fixing of export quotas for each of our various commodities with each of the various nations, based upon any 4-year average in a 12-year period prior to the issuance of the President's proclamation under the Neutrality Act.

Since I have been a Member of this body I have made some effort to study the complex problems with which the Nation has been confronted. For many years I have been convinced that most if not all the problems with which we are now wrestling, and with which we have been struggling for 10 years, were intensified by the effect of the World War upon the agricultural and industrial segments of our economy. Some of them, I believe, were produced as a result of the impact of the World War and our final participation in it. But be that as it may, Mr. President, I think no person seriously concerned with the affairs of this Nation can look with complacency upon the threat which the impact of war and its effect upon this country are bound to produce. Unless we are willing to take the necessary steps in order to prevent further distortion of our economy as the result of the impact of war upon it, we shall find when war is concluded that each and every one of the paramount problems with which we are concerned has been intensified, augmented, and made more difficult of solution.

The amendment now pending is designed to create an export-import control board in order to strengthen the position of the United States in dealing with present wartime-trade restrictions imposed by foreign nations, both belligerent and neutral.

As I view the matter, present circumstances have completely altered the basic considerations involved in the trade-agreements program. Foreign countries for the most part are playing the game of international trade according to new rules, while the United States is still endeavoring to play it according to the old rules. The new rules consist of trade bans, export-import licensing, quotas, commodity controls, shipping controls, Government monopoly buying and selling, restrictions on foreign exchange, manipulation of currency values, preferential treatment to political allies, and so forth.

These controls violate the spirit and intent of the trade-agreements program. I regard it as much too optimistic a view to say that they are only temporary, and that their effects are merely transitory.

Now let us consider briefly some of the examples.

The simple ban on imports and exports under British Board of Trade orders of September 4, 1939, and subsequently amended at later dates, prohibited the importation of numerous products, including the following: Fresh fruits, fruit juices, canned vegetables, honey, hops, poultry and game, meat extracts, dried vegetables, flowers, poultry and meat pastes, sausages, meat pies, canned and preserved crabs, lobsters and oysters, and confectionery of all kinds. This is a sample list of the type of ban on imports and exports to which I have referred as being one of the new rules of the game.

Also, there is import and export licensing—a type of control which may allow some flow, but frequently is synonymous with a simple ban on the trade. A partial list of products controlled by the British Government under import licenses is as follows: Tobacco, canned fruits, beef, veal, mutton, lamb, and pork products, paper, pulp, and paper products, wood and timber products, aluminum and aluminum products, eggs and egg products, raw hides and skins, flax, industrial and agricultural machinery.

Also, there are export-licensing controls, ostensibly to conserve domestic supply, but also resulting in enhancing the monopolistic position of the country employing them in the world market, affecting wool, grain, and flour, a wide range of industrial materials, half fabricates, and manufactured goods.

As an example of the commodity type of control, even in cases in which import permits are not required, the British Ministry of Food may control imports and make a Government profit. It may set import prices for commodities that either preclude imports from certain countries or result in depressing the prices thereof. Then, in the organization of distribution, the food supplies acquired may be resold at a profit at domestically fixed prices.

Also, we know that shipping controls are another factor in the situation; and by exercising control over shipping, belligerent governments can designate what commodities are to move, and how space is to be allotted.

The control of foreign exchange is another important factor influencing international trade today. Not only are all payments for exports and imports closely controlled but in the policy promulgated in South America by Great Britain exports and imports of third-party countries are directly affected, as witness the recent pronouncement that in dealing with South American countries Great Britain will require payment for British goods to be made in dollar exchange, which obviously means that an already limited supply of dollar exchange available for the purchase of American export products will be further reduced to the detriment of our export trade.

Also, there is the growing tendency toward Government monopoly in buying and selling commodities. We already know of the concerted action of the French and British Governments which has resulted in changing a free market into a monopoly market, creating immense bargaining powers against which at the present time we are pitted without adequate means to protect either our export trade or to prevent distortion of our domestic economy.

Finally, there is the wartime preferential treatment of various nations. We already know of the trilateral agreement of the United Kingdom, France, and Turkey. The United States commodity most seriously affected, of course, is tobacco. There are likewise the bilateral agreements of Great Britain with Sweden, Norway, Turkey, Greece, Spain, and Switzerland, and the bilateral agreements of France with Spain and Yugoslavia.

Import licenses are granted in some instances only to empire countries for numerous commodities which are important in world trade.

Mr. President, I wish briefly to cite some of the examples of the export trade we have already lost, and what it means in terms of dollars and cents. According to the information which one is able to obtain, it appears that as a result of the agreement with Turkey we are likely to lose $70,000,000 of tobacco exports, which will be purchased instead in Turkey, Greece, and Bulgaria. The United Kingdom market of $18,000,000 of fresh fruit and $17,000,000 of preserved fruit has been partially lost through the bans which have been already promulgated.

Raw cotton exports to the United Kingdom, averaging over $85,000,000 annually in recent years have been placed in jeopardy by the recent curtailment-of-cotton-imports policy, and the shifting of the purchases to other nations producing cotton of comparable quality.

There is in jeopardy also our normal $29,000,000 worth of exports to the United Kingdom of United States grains, flour, lard, hams, and pork as the result of the strict control which has already been established.

French import control over fruit affects our normal fruit exports of $8,000,000 annually. The French control over imports also curtails the importation of cash registers, spark plugs, fountain pens, dried prunes, insulating boards, typewriters, refrigerators, passenger cars, pharmaceutical supplies, and lubricating oil.

Mr. President, it is often advanced, as an answer to any concern expressed over what is happening to our export trade, that the total figures show a marked increase; but what concerns me is that there has been such a sharp and drastic change in the composition of that trade. Foodstuffs have normally constituted from 11 to 15 percent of our exports, yet in recent months they have amounted to only 5 to 8 percent. Compared with pre-war periods for comparable months, exports of foodstuffs have declined 20 to 30 percent, while manufactured and semimanufactured exports have increased more than 50 percent.

There have been conspicuous decreases in the exports of selected commodities, taking the 2-month period of January 1940 and December 1939, compared with a year ago. Unmanufactured tobacco has fallen off 55 percent; fruits and nuts, 51 percent; apples, 83 percent; oranges, 30 percent; grains and preparations, 38 percent. On the other hand, there have been very conspicuous increases in the exports of selected commodities. Aircraft exports have gone up 419 percent; iron and steel-mill products, 111 percent; copper manufactures, 132 percent; aluminum manufactures, 98 percent.

I think we should not overlook the matter called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], namely, the effect of currency devaluation in the international trade situation and upon the competitive position of the United States.

Mr. President, in this connection I ask to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a more detailed list, although only partial, of agricultural products affected by import prohibitions imposed by the British Board of Trade on September 4 and 5, 1939, and at later dates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask also to have printed in the RECORD data showing the average annual United States imports to the United Kingdom, to France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Sweden.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator spoke of inhibitions on importations imposed by Britain. Are those restrictions directed against the exports of the United States alone, or are they general in character?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In some instances they are directed against the United States, and in some instances they are directed against several countries.

Mr. President, I am glad the Senator asked the question because I am not contending that we can claim discrimination in the accepted sense of that word. My only point is that we are confronted with a situation which threatens seriously and adversely to affect the economy of the United States, and, therefore, that we should be in such a position that we will be equally well armed and equipped in the economic sense to meet not only what has happened up to now but the eventualities of the immediate future.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator is not immediately concerned as to whether this result comes from discrimination or from the general application of import prohibitions?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not; and I recognize, I may say very frankly, that it is quite natural for Britain and France to curtail their purchases in this country and make purchases elsewhere, and thus to conserve their dollar exchange for the purchase of the commodities which they desire particularly to obtain from us. At the same time I do not think we should refuse to recognize the effect of their policy upon this country, in the first place, and, secondly, its potential threat to any return to a normal world-trade situation in the future, for it must be obvious that if the war has any duration in time at all, the canalizations of trade which are being set up, and the monopolies which are being created, will inevitably result in vested interests being established from the standpoint of nations or colonies; and that there will be undue expansion of productive capacity in the countries enjoying exclusive access to these important markets. I contend that, regardless of what one's position may be in relation to the pending joint resolution, and regardless of whether one has hope that in the future the policies embodied in the pending joint resolution may ultimately prevail in the world, unless we take action to prevent the canalization and the crystallization of trade under the impact of wartime controls and monopolistic practices upon the part of belligerent and other nations, we will be in danger of creating such a situation that it will be impossible to secure consideration of that point of view.

Mr. President, there is not only the effect of these bans upon our export trade, but there is likewise the situation created by the diversion of the purchase of these commodities, the export of which from this country is denied, and the purchase made in other countries.

Take the case of the ban which was placed on the importation of apples from the United States. We find that there was not a cutting off of importation of apples to the United Kingdom, but, instead, the purchases were diverted to Canada and South Africa.

It has also been announced that the British Government has taken over the entire Australian surplus of canned and dried fruit.

So far as wheat is concerned, a policy has been established of selective buying of wheat which favors the cobelligerent countries of the Empire. Close cooperation between France and Britain carries with it the threat, too, that our wheat may be excluded from their markets unless conforming to the prices they establish.

I wish to call attention to an article appearing in the Washington Post of the 25th of March entitled "British Expect to Buy Less Cotton in United States." I ask unanimous consent that that article may be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 3.)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I also wish to call attention to an article entitled "Brazilian Cotton and Britain," published in the New York Times of March 30, 1940, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 4.)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to read briefly excerpts from the London Economist of February 24, 1940, as follows:

"It is estimated that France's food supply can now be covered from home and colonial sources, leaving exportable surpluses of rice, cocoa, tea, rum, palm dates, mahogany, nickel, graphite, and salt. French colonies share the general colonial disadvantage of producing very few of the raw materials of industry, but France reckons that her large colonial purchases, by saving foreign currency, will enable her to buy minerals and ores where they are available.

"Britain * * * has not turned to her colonial empire to any great extent. * * * One exception to the general policy is the Government's decision to buy up the crops in certain colonies. On November 14 the Gold Coast's entire cocoa crop was purchased, and this transaction was followed by bulk purchases elsewhere of tea, sugar, and sisal. Here, however, it is not so much a question of laying in war stocks as of safeguarding colonial producers against the vast maladjustments occasioned by the war."

Also a quotation from page 334 of the same issue:

Page 334 ("Argentina's Market for British Goods"):

"The River Plata markets, especially the Argentine, afford a unique opportunity to Great Britain for the expansion of her export trade. Britain's exceptional opportunity in the Argentine arises mainly from the fact that, in exchange for recent large purchases by Britain and France of Argentine meat, grain, wool, hides, and other products, the Argentine Government's policy is to maintain imports from the Allies at as high a level as possible; and at present relatively few Argentine import permits are granted except for goods of British Empire and French origin."

There is not only the grave danger of the distortion of our own export trade, but there is likewise a threat at least in the situation so far as the American consumer is concerned.

Strategic commodities, the domestic consumption of which is almost wholly from imports, and derived principally from the British and French Empires, are as follows:

Crude rubber, tin, cocoa beans, burlap, cashew nuts, nickel and alloy, diamonds, palm oil, mahogany logs, and chrome ore.

Although there are numerous other factors that affect the supply and price of these commodities, and the effect of any single control measure cannot be easily demonstrated, the set-up obviously has in it a threat to the best interests of the American consumer.

Price changes noted in the following commodities must be viewed in the light of a general 5 to 6 percent increase in the unit value of imports and the general wholesale price level since the beginning of the war. I wish to call attention to the fact that in regard to rubber, for example, it is generally recognized that even before the war the International Rubber Regulation Committee controlled 95 percent of the world's production of crude rubber. About one-half of the United States imports of crude rubber are carried in British vessels. Trade and insurance rates since the war have increased more than 20 percent. In passing it may be said, Mr. President, that recent dispatches indicate that Great Britain expects to make $150,000,000 annual profit in taking over the Nation's shipping and increasing rates as the result of Government control. The price of crude rubber was about 26 percent higher in the last 4 months of 1939 as compared with the previous 4 months.

The United States Tariff Commission report entitled "The European War and United States Imports," on page B-83, contains the following:

The British Government is in a position largely to control the amount of tin which nonproducing countries can obtain. Its need for dollar exchange will presumably be a factor in determining its exercise of this control over shipments to the United States.

The price of tin in the last 4 months of 1939 was about 12 percent higher than the price for the previous 4 months.

The same situation exists so far as cocoa beans are concerned. We are the largest importer of cocoa beans, and we depend not only on Brazil but also on the British and French possessions. In the last 4 months of 1939, as compared with the previous 4 months, prices rose about 28 percent.

British India is practically the only source of jute fiber, which has a wide variety of uses. Its price has increased approximately 13 percent.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a table adapted from the United States Tariff Commission report just referred to, entitled "Strategic United States Imports Supplied Largely by British and French Empires," showing the average annual value of imports and the percentage of domestic consumption supplied by such imports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, aside from the physical destruction of wealth, the economic curse of modern war is a maladjustment of a nation's productive system, the overexpansion of war industries, and the consequent distortion and unbalancing of the nonmilitary manufacturing and agricultural segments of its economy. Although it is clear that the American people do not want war, or any of the disastrous consequences involved in our participation in war, the present policy of the Federal Government is resulting in an expansion of war industries at the expense of the farmer and nonmilitary manufacturers. Unless we take effective measures to prevent our business structure from being pulled out of shape by the present abnormal demand for arms, munitions, and war materials, we are headed for another bitter and prolonged period of domestic readjustment after this war, greater than the one with which we have been struggling for the past 20 years. Already serious damage has been inflicted on certain American exporting groups, particularly agriculture. The domestic consumer is unprotected against concerted action to control the supply and price of strategic imports. Our export-import pattern, and our general economy, are being distorted by deliberate diversions of normal trade.

Most important of all, we are facing probable permanent loss of many world markets because of the establishment of new channels of world trade fostered by present circumstances. By a policy of control such as my amendment would make possible we could limit foreign purchases of war materials to such amounts as we could safely supply without developing a lopsided productive system. The amendment would establish an export-import control board, composed of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce. The board would be empowered to investigate all discriminations against American trade, and authorized to control exports and imports to and from discriminating countries by means of registration and licensing of all importers and exporters affected.

The four objectives set forth in the amendment are—

First, to maintain for American producers a fair share of the world markets for agricultural commodities and other articles and materials.

Second, to avoid, as far as possible, any effect on our domestic prices for such commodities, articles, and materials by reason of international prices fixed by belligerents and other nations for similar commodities, articles, and materials.

Third, to protect American consumers against unduly high prices for such imported commodities, articles, and materials.

Fourth, to protect American producers against the dumping of certain commodities, articles, and materials in the United States by belligerents or other nations seeking funds for the conduct of the war or for other purposes.

Mr. President, the establishment of such a board would place the United States in a bargaining position equal to that of belligerent countries. If necessary, the bold use of a market-basket technique of sales, requiring purchasers to maintain a somewhat normal composition of purchases under threat of withholding necessary and demanded commodities, could be a powerful weapon for our protection. But the mere presence of such power, not its actual use, might suffice. How the United States can go on in this situation without implementing the devices and the power which our Government can utilize to protect us in this very difficult situation is beyond my comprehension.

I know it may be said, as it has been said elsewhere, that the existence of trade agreements is a means whereby we can protect our interests in the international situation. The fact may be brought out that a quota was established to protect the fur industry, and that we have obtained a quota arrangement with Canada for the importation of pork. But, Mr. President, I contend that we cannot place reliance upon the existing trade agreements, or further extension of the power to negotiate them, as a means of protecting us in a world which is armed to the teeth, not only literally but from an economic standpoint—a world in which not only so-called totalitarian nations are utilizing totalitarian techniques, but a world in which all belligerents have resorted to totalitarian methods of control as a means of economic warfare.

Trade agreements are no adequate protection to the people of this country, for the simple reason that the only power which could be utilized under the trade agreements is a threat to abrogate and to set them aside. Let us be frank about it. With all due respect to the Secretary of State, everyone knows that the trade-agreements policy is the keystone in the arch of his administration. We know that he would be the last man to want to strike down one of these trade agreements. Therefore it is absolutely essential, not only in the light of what has already transpired, but more important still in the light of what we can expect in the immediate future, that we should empower the Executive arm of the Government with an instrumentality which it can utilize to meet and thus to protect our Nation and its people from the effect of economic warfare. Already, Mr. President, as I have briefly tried to show this afternoon, many of the actions so far taken have had an adverse effect upon our export trade and our domestic economy.

If the war in Europe becomes a total war, what has been done up to this time will seem like mere child's play compared with the situation which will confront us in the immediate future. It is because I believe that the mere establishment of the proposed board would go a long way toward strengthening the arm of this Government in its negotiations, and because I believe that the Congress would thus discharge its responsibility in endeavoring to protect the American producer and consumer, that I am urging the Senate to adopt this amendment.

Naturally, Mr. President, if the eventualities which I foresee do not materialize it will be unnecessary to invoke the power to license the imports and exports from particular nations abroad. But if we do not set up such an agency now and equip the Government with the power to deal with the situation, I think we may find, even before the Congress returns next January, that situations will have developed which will require a special session of Congress.

I appeal to the Senate to adopt this amendment and thus to discharge its responsibility. I hope that at the appropriate time I may secure a yea and nay vote on the amendment.

EXHIBIT 1

BRITISH TRADE CONTROLS

Partial list of agricultural products affected by importation prohibitions imposed by British Board of Trade on September 4 and 5, 1939, and later dates: Fresh fruits, fruit juices, canned vegetables (other than tomatoes), honey, hops, poultry and game, meat extracts, dried vegetables (other than peas, beans, and lentils), flowers, poultry and meat pastes, sausages, meat pies, canned and preserved crabs, lobsters and oysters, confectionery of all kinds.

Partial list of products requiring import licenses and date effective (foreign-exchange permits necessary for all other products not controlled by import licenses): Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, and pork products (February 9); tobacco (January 1); paper, pulp, and paper products (February 9); wood and timber products (December 27); aluminum and aluminum products (January 25); egg and egg products (December 11); raw hides and skins (October 20); industrial and agricultural machinery (October 24); flax (November 20); wicker furniture and basketware (November 20); canned fruits.

Export licensing controls have been applied to a wide range of industrial materials, half-fabricates, and manufactured goods, grain and flour, wool, etc. (ostensibly to conserve domestic supply, probably actually to enhance its world economic position also).

Example of centralized monopoly buying: All sales of cereals and cereal products for importation into the United Kingdom are made through the cereals advisory control board.

Example of price-fixing controls: British Government establishes maximum wholesale prices to be paid for meat; all imports are subject to the complete requisition (and resale thereof) by the Ministry of Food.

BRITISH EXPECT TO BUY LESS COTTON IN THE UNITED STATES—WILL PURCHASE STAPLE FROM SOUTH AMERICA IN BID FOR TRADE

British trade authorities have informed American officials that the United Kingdom expects to curtail purchases of American cotton in a further move to conserve foreign exchange.

Disclosing this yesterday, Agriculture Department officials forecast difficulties in disposing of 1940 cotton abroad and predicted that the Government would again be asked to advance large sums to growers in the form of loans on unmarketable surpluses.

The United Kingdom has been by far the largest recent importer of American cotton. It took 1,526,000 bales in the 7 months ended March 1, compared with only 320,000 bales in the same period a year previously.

BRITISH BID FOR LATIN TRADE

Increased imports in the last few months by France, Italy, Japan, and several other countries, as well as by the British, have put American cotton exports at the highest level in several years. The total for the marketing season ending July 31 is expected to be in excess of 6,000,000 bales, compared with 3,225,000 last season.

Officials said that Great Britain was preparing to buy more cotton in South America. By so doing it hopes to win a big share of export markets for industrial goods formerly supplied by Germany.

It was explained that British ships which transport cotton from the United States frequently come here empty.

One Agriculture Department cotton authority said that on the basis of present prospects, it was likely that 2,000,000 bales or more of 1940 cotton would have to be kept off the market by means of Government loans. His estimate was based upon a 12,000,000-bale crop.

This season cotton is being withdrawn from storage under loans to supply market needs. The 1939 crop of 11,500,000 bales will run about 2,000,000 bales short of demand.

Great Britain, as a war measure, already has restricted imports of American tobacco and canned fruits and has reduced sharply its imports of apples and several other agricultural products. These steps were taken to save foreign exchange in this country for war supplies.

BRAZILIAN COTTON AND BRITAIN

In line with the British Government's policy of increasing purchases of cotton grown outside the United States, the Liverpool Cotton Association is said to be considering plans for establishing a new contract on which cotton from Brazil would be tendered. Early this week the British Government announced that, to conserve foreign exchange for the purchase of military necessities, in the future it would confine its purchases of cotton as much as possible to countries other than the United States. Brazil now is exporting about 1,250,000 bales of cotton annually, a large part of which compares favorably in quality with that produced in the United States. Since exports of cotton from the United States to Britain has been running at a high rate since August 1, the cessation of purchases will not seriously affect the distribution of last year's crop. However, so far as the coming crop is concerned, it may be a different story.

Recent changes in composition of exports

(Consideration of all exports of United States merchandise by 4 major categories)

NOTE.—The value of exports in the last 4 months of 1937 was practically equal to the value of exports in the same period (war period) in 1939. The distinct change in composition is apparent from the following table:

[Millions of dollars]

Type of exports	Pre-war—Last quarter, 1937	War—Last quarter, 1939	Percentage change—War to pre-war
All exports	1,250	1,251
Crude materials	330	267	−19
Foodstuffs	133	114	−14
Semimanufactures	225	263	+17
Manufactures	562	607	+9

The real distortion of United States export trade, however, did not come until about December. Comparisons of the same four categories for the recent months of December and January with a year ago and 2 years ago show the same distortions much more exaggerated.

Type of exports	Percentage changes—Recent (December-January) period compared with—

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on March 28, 1940, the President had approved and signed the following acts:

S. 1398. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, as amended, to increase the penalties for peacetime violations of such act; and

S. 2739. An act to amend section 45 of the United States Criminal Code to make it applicable to the outlying possessions of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, informed the Senate that Hon. SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas, had been elected Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 2689. An act to amend section 33 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, and for other purposes;

S. 2977. An act authorizing the construction and maintenance of a dike or dam across Stansbury Creek in Baltimore County, Md.;

S. 3209. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Mississippi State Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Pearl River at or near Carthage, in the State of Mississippi;

S. J. Res. 153. Joint resolution to approve the action of the Secretary of the Interior in deferring the collection of certain irrigation charges against lands under the Blackfeet Indian irrigation project; and

S. J. Res. 226. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. LUCAS obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which seeks to extend the authority of the President of the United States under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

I always regret to have to disagree with my very able friend the Senator from Wisconsin upon measures which come before the Senate of the United States, but in respect to the pending amendment I am constrained to disagree with the position taken by the Senator for a number of reasons. I do not disagree with the objective or the purpose which the amendment seeks to accomplish. After reading it carefully, it is my understanding that it is to provide for the absolute control of foreign trade, to prevent discrimination against United States commerce by foreign countries, and the dumping of foreign products into United States markets. No Senator can quarrel with that objective. No individual can disagree with that premise. And if I did not think at this moment that this was merely a duplication of existing law, or at least almost a duplication of existing law; and if there were not a delegation of authority to the executive branch of the Government which seems to me greater than perhaps any other delegation of power outside of wartime, I should not hesitate to support the amendment.

But, Mr. President, there are a number of existing laws which deal forcibly and thoroughly, it seems to me, with the subject matter at hand. In ascertaining just what these laws are it is necessary to do a considerable amount of research work to determine how these laws affect the subject matter of the amendment. If one could take all the various provisions dealing with foreign trade, and discriminations against the United States, dealing with the export and the import markets of this Nation; if all the various provisions which are now a part of the law of the land could be codified and brought in under one bill, after a most thorough study by the experts in the various departments as to what each and every one of these provisions actually means, and how far they go, I am sure it would be a very constructive and forward-looking proposition.

The objectives of this measure are doubtless laudable, but the machinery which it provides is an unnecessary duplication of what is already in existence.

As I listened to the Senator from Wisconsin it seemed to me that he made a most powerful argument for the continuation of the trade treaties. Even the argument made in behalf of his amendment is also an argument in behalf of the continuation of the Trade Treaties Act which is now before the Senate of the United States.

I agree with him that no one can look with complacency upon the impact of this war in Europe as it affects our national economy, and it strikes me that that is one of the basic reasons, one of the fundamental thoughts, that is back of the continuation of the trade-treaty program.

We know what totalitarian governments are doing with the canalization of trade. We know what they are doing with respect to monopolies. We know what they are doing with respect to discrimination. They are going to continue to do that so long as the war exists in Europe. The type of legislation which the Senate of the United States is considering at this moment, in my opinion, will do more to take away the shock from that impact when war is finally over than any one piece of legislation yet proposed. At least, Mr. President, we have a program under the reciprocal-trade agreements. I do not say that the reciprocal trade agreements program is perfect. No one will contend it is. But, as I look at the past, and attempt in my limited way to understand what has gone on in the Congress of the United States over a period of years with respect to the tariff-making power of the Congress, and what has and has not been accomplished, it seems to me that under no circumstances in this particular crisis should we fail to continue the one and only program for the protection of our foreign trade in existence in the United States at this time.

Mr. President, I am advised that when the last tariff act, the Smoot-Hawley Act, was written on the statute books of the United States the Congress took some 12 or 15 months before it finally completed the measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. That bill was begun in the House of Representatives in December 1928 and was finished in June 1930, which is the equivalent of 19 months expended by both Houses together in the writing of the tariff bill of 1930.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. I want to be on the conservative side.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARBOUR in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I call to the attention of the Senator from Kentucky that during his argument, powerful as it was, made 10 years ago on this subject, he read a statement in which he gave the amount of time occupied in considering tariff measures, and he was demonstrating then that the time occupied in considering tariff measures was not disproportionately great, and those bills had been considered in a reasonable length of time. Does the Senator recall that?

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose the Senator from California refers to the debate had in the Senate on the flexible-tariff provisions of the act?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, I am referring to the time when the Senator from Kentucky made a statement with respect to the amount of time taken in the making of tariff laws.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not recall exactly the different lengths of time consumed in the writing of previous tariff bills. I am speaking now of the present law, the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, the consideration of which consumed 19 months.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Quite so.

Mr. BARKLEY. And a great deal of that time was consumed, I will say, in the effort of some of us here to prevent some of the monstrosities which later went into that law, the inclusion of which we were not altogether able to succeed in preventing.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Quite so. But the Senator demonstrated how the other bills had taken but a brief period, and he was demonstrating that, in proving that the bills could be considered and passed by the Congress of the United States within a reasonable time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Illinois, although there is no limit upon debate now.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I beg the Senator's pardon for taking so much of his time.

Mr. LUCAS. That is all right.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has been 10 years since I looked at those figures. One bill that I recall referring to was the Underwood tariff bill, consideration of which was begun in April 1913, and I think completed in September of that year.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator ran down the line and gave the time consumed in the consideration of the various tariff bills.

Mr. BARKLEY. That may be.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will bring the Senator the statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. That still does not controvert the statement that the one we are operating under now required 11 months for its consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAVIS. I pointed out yesterday that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] did not tell us that during the 19 months he said elapsed between the inception and approval of that act, Congress in the same period, and in addition to the Tariff Act, passed 89 private acts, 109 public resolutions, and 378 public acts. Neither did he indicate the relatively small number of items in a trade agreement when placed in comparison with a major revision of the tariff, with its thousands of items and its highly controversial administrative features nor the 235 yea-and-nay votes in the Senate alone, all of which constitute a magnitude that no trade agreement could possibly attain.

The Trade Agreements Act was approved June 12, 1934, and it has taken nearly 6 years to negotiate and put into effect 22 agreements; and the total of items negotiated does not approach the number in the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I appreciate the contributions made to this argument by various distinguished Senators. However, the fact remains, regardless of the number of laws that were passed, that 19 months were required before the Smoot-Hawley tariff was finally put through.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is true that a few bills were sandwiched in between various portions of the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley bill. I hold in my hand a pamphlet containing nothing but the roll calls in the United States Senate on the Smoot-Hawley tariff. There are 352 pages of roll calls alone. This pamphlet does not contain any of the arguments made for or against amendments, or the bill itself.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAVIS. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I pointed out that there were 235 roll calls.

Mr. LUCAS. On the Smoot-Hawley tariff alone?

Mr. DAVIS. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. The longer we debate the more convinced I become that the trade-agreement program is a proper one to continue. If any other Senator wishes me to yield, I shall be glad to do so, because Senators are making a splendid contribution to my argument.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. As I cited from the RECORD, at the time of the debate on the Smoot-Hawley tariff 1,108 pages were consumed in that debate by the Democrats. The Republicans consumed 791½ pages, and the so-called insurgents consumed 799½ pages.

Mr. LUCAS. It is apparent that the Democrats were trying to stop the Smoot-Hawley tariff, because they talked more than did the Republicans, and I commend them for their efforts at that time. I think they were on the right track then, and I think we are on the right track now with respect to the tariff situation.

Mr. DAVIS. If the present division were about the same as it was during the time of the Smoot-Hawley debates, the pending measure would not have a Chinaman's chance to pass.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator can draw his own conclusions on that question, but I say that every statement which has been made in the colloquy between the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] merely corroborates and intensifies the point I made a moment ago, that some 15 months of almost constant hearings before committees of Congress were required before the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act could be passed. No one would understand that the Senate was in continuous session during that time. I imagine that at that particular time the Senator from Pennsylvania was interested in certain articles, and that he required several weeks to obtain what he had to have for his constituents in Pennsylvania, and I congratulate him for it.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Pennsylvania was not personally interested in the tariff act at that particular time.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is very much interested in the trade-agreements program now before us.

At any rate, Mr. President, getting back to the point I made, in the event we do not continue the trade-treaty program, what is the program of the Congress of the United States with respect to our foreign policy dealing with our commercial trade with foreign nations? Do we revert to the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act? Do we remain in statu quo so far as the trade agreements are concerned? What door is open for the Secretary of State or the President of the United States or any other governmental agency to go through to take care of the United States, so far as her commercial trade is concerned, in a way that would be satisfactory to every Senator? It seems to me that there is absolutely no program left if we discard the trade-agreements program at this time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan, because I know he can tell me about the program.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think there is an alternative. Entirely aside from political considerations, I think it would be very unfortunate if the alternative were not in mind. I completely agree with the Senator regarding the iniquity of a general tariff revision. The word "iniquity" is hardly a strong enough word to describe general tariff revisions. I think that if I were to confront another I should quit and go home rather than suffer the burdens of such a horrible experience.

Mr. LUCAS. I think that is a grand confession for the Senator to make.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not know that it needs to be labeled a confession, because that is a rather invidious word under the circumstances.

Mr. LUCAS. If it is invidious, I withdraw it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think there is an alternative. I think that the elastic provision of the tariff, if reduced to a practical basis, can keep our tariffs in relationship to American costs of production rather scientifically all the time, without the necessity of a general tariff revision. It is that sort of objective toward which I should like to labor.

Mr. LUCAS. What the Senator suggests may perhaps be ideal from his viewpoint; but how does he propose to do it in the event we discard the trade-treaty program? How can the Congress meet the situation which the Senator is now discussing? That is what I should like to know, and what I think the country would like to know.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it could be done through the creation of a foreign trade board.

Mr. LUCAS. How long would it take us to set up such machinery?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think we could create it long before we shall have any opportunity effectively to negotiate additional trade agreements in this war period and in the period of post-war readjustment. I think it could be done before this session of Congress adjourns if there were any inclination to that end. But even though no new instrumentality were created, I revert to the fact that we already have an elastic tariff clause which can be administered through the Tariff Commission if the law is merely amended so as to change the cost-of-production rule to a basis of American costs rather than the difficult basis of comparing American and foreign costs, if the Senator follows me.

Mr. LUCAS. I follow the Senator, and for a long time have attempted to follow him upon the formula of the cost of production. I also followed the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] the other day when he made a most penetrating and scientific speech on that very question. When I read the Senator's remarks upon that question, and read the remarks of the Senator from Georgia upon the formula of cost of production, and read what distinguished men in the Tariff Commission have said about that very thing, how uneffective, elusive, and shadowy it is, so far as forming any real base for the accomplishment of the objective desired by the distinguished Senator from Michigan is concerned, I am constrained to disagree with the Senator from Michigan. I say that what he suggests might be a factor, but it is a slight factor, and it is an unknown factor. As tariff men have said, cost of production abroad can never be computed in a way which is satisfactory so far as the making of tariff rates is concerned.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that all the comments to which the Senator refers deal with the difficulty of obtaining foreign costs and comparing American costs with them.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am saying that that difficulty can be simplified by basing the computation upon the landed foreign cost in the United States. I agree that it is exceedingly difficult to obtain foreign costs; but I am not closing the door to the possibility that a far more tangible rule of costs can be produced within our own jurisdiction, where we can obtain the information with reasonable accuracy and conclusiveness.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator elaborate on what he means by the landed foreign cost?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I mean the cost of a commodity landed in the United States, as compared with the cost of producing that commodity in the United States.

Mr. LUCAS. Does not that method necessarily mean that we must determine the cost abroad before we can determine the landed cost?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; because we know what we are paying for the import.

Mr. LUCAS. That may be true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I realize that the subject is still somewhat nebulous. I am undertaking to say to the Senator that, so far as I am concerned, when I turn my back on the reciprocal trade treaty formula of operating tariffs, I am not turning my face back to general tariff revision. I am seeking to find the middle ground on which it can be done through the Tariff Commission or a foreign trade board operating under definite cost-of-production criteria.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate the Senator's viewpoint and moderation. I do not altogether disagree with the viewpoint, but I cannot follow him as to how long it would be before we could obtain the necessary machinery to put into effect what he has in mind; and what would happen to our national economy in the meantime.

Mr. President, I do not believe that we shall have peace across the way for some time. Nevertheless, my opinion is only the opinion of one individual. I have discussed the question of the war across the way with others who can see an outcome different from the one I contemplate. I say that if there was ever a time of emergency in the United States insofar as our commercial relations with foreign governments are concerned, it is at this very moment. If the reciprocal trade agreement program was an emergency program 3 years ago, it is a triple-emergency program at this very moment.

I shudder to think what would happen to the United States of America in dealing with totalitarian governments across the pond in the event peace should come to the world within the next 3 or 4 or 6 months and we should have no program so far as our trade relations are concerned. I firmly believe that in the event the trade treaty agreements law is not extended for another 3 years, the Congress of the United States will be called upon to do something in the way of drafting a program. We cannot sit idly by and let the situation drift without knowing where we are going, without a definite policy on the most important economic question confronting the United States. No, Mr. President, we must have a program of some kind.

It is all very well to say that I have a program, and some other Senator has a program, and that we shall get together within a short time, and that the Congress of the United States will be able to agree upon a program of moderation which will meet all the contingencies in connection with this very, very important question. History refutes that argument. The 15 months of tariff logrolling in connection with the Smoot-Hawley bill, the last tariff bill passed by the Senate of the United States, is an effectual answer to the argument that we can agree in a short while upon an adequate program different from the one now before us for consideration.

Mr. President, the world is in turmoil, confusion, and chaos. Thank God, America stands at peace; and under the Neutrality Act we have laid down a policy which says that we will not send manpower across the seas to participate in the air, on the land, or on the sea. In my humble opinion, we have laid down a policy which says that America will never see another cemetery of American youth on foreign soil.

When the time comes across the sea for civilization to resume its march—and I say that there is a chance that civilization may be almost destroyed, or at least seriously crippled, as the result of the war in Europe—when the time comes when the warring nations must have peace—and that time will come, whether within 3 months, 6 years, or 30 years—this country, in my humble judgment, should be in a position to aid in binding up the wounds inflicted by the wrath and the destruction incident to cruel war. They will need us, yes, the world will need us more than it has ever needed the United States of America before, and this Nation must be in a position to help rectify the economic abnormalities created by war if we are ever to have peace on earth and good will toward men. That is one of the reasons I feel so strongly about the reciprocal-trade agreements and the reciprocal-trade program.

My State is affected by them. Blackstrap molasses is coming up the Illinois River, duty free, from the tropical country of Cuba, and competing with the corn farmer in the corn belt of Illinois. Zinc smelters in my State are complaining about the reciprocal-trade agreements. Sago and tapioca imported into this country are competing with the produce of those who make the fine corn sirup which is served upon the breakfast tables of Senators every morning. Mr. President, I sympathize with and appreciate the position of those people, and, as a United States Senator, I have tried to do something for them. But the principle of the Trade Agreements Act, affecting the national economy of this country, affecting the international economy of the world, so to speak, to me is so much more vital to the general welfare than individual problems that, so far as I am concerned, I am forced to look to the larger aspect of the problem, and I will have to take my chances and suffer the consequences of the displeasure of those who unfortunately are adversely affected by this program.

There was never legislation written by the Congress of the United States that did not affect unfavorably this industry or that, in one way or another. Has there ever been formulated a tariff program that was satisfactory to everyone? Was the Smoot-Hawley tariff program in keeping with the best interests of American industry, agriculture, and labor? Certainly not. Someone is always unfavorably affected, someone is always injured by practically every law that is passed, depending upon geography, climate, industry, population, and a great number of other factors which vary in particular sections of the country.

Mr. President, I have digressed from the subject matter of the amendment I was discussing, but to me the proposed extension of the trade-agreements program is legislation that looks far down the mountainside, it is legislation that is vital to the future of this great country of ours, and I shall stand for legislation of that type irrespective of what may happen to my political fortunes in Illinois. What may happen to me is not of great importance; individuals are only the means or instrumentalities through which Governments function, but insofar as I am concerned it does mean something to me to support a program in which I conscientiously believe and which will affect the future of this great country of ours. I may be wrong about it, and those who take the opposite view may be right. I question no one's motives or sincerity of purpose in the discussion of this tremendously important program. I do not claim that I know all about the program, either. I merely say that I have formed the best judgment about this legislation of which I am capable, after reading all I could read about it, and considering it from every angle, and I am convinced that it is a program designed to aid the greatest number in this great Republic.

Now I wish to return to a discussion of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. As I said, I think it has a laudable purpose, but it seems to me that legislation has already been enacted covering what the Senator seeks to do.

For instance, in existing law provision is made for the imposition of countervailing duties on subsidized imports. That is found in section 303 of the Tariff Act. It is rather a lengthy section, and, in order to make the RECORD complete, in order to keep from taking more time of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point section 303 of the Tariff Act of 1930, which deals with countervailing duties, and which, as I see it, is applicable to the amendment before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COUNTERVAILING DUTIES

[U. S. C., title 19, sec. 1303 (sec. 303, Tariff Act of 1930)]

Whenever any country, dependency, colony, province, or other political subdivision of government, person, partnership, association, cartel, or corporation shall pay or bestow, directly or indirectly, any bounty or grant upon the manufacture or production or export of any article or merchandise manufactured or produced in such country, dependency, colony, province, or other political subdivision of government, and such article or merchandise is dutiable under the provisions of this chapter, then upon the importation of any such article or merchandise into the United States, whether the same shall be imported directly from the country of production or otherwise, and whether such article or merchandise is imported in the same condition as when exported from the country of production or has been changed in condition by remanufacture or otherwise, there shall be levied and paid, in all such cases, in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by this chapter, an additional duty equal to the net amount of such bounty or grant, however the same be paid or bestowed. The Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time ascertain and determine, or estimate, the net amount of each such bounty or grant, and shall declare the net amount so determined or estimated. The Secretary of the Treasury shall make all regulations he may deem necessary for the identification of such articles and merchandise and for the assessment and collection of such additional duties.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there is in title II of the Emergency Tariff Act of 1921 a provision which also has a bearing on the subject, in that it imposes additional duties in case of dumping. As it is also somewhat lengthy, I ask unanimous consent that it be placed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ANTIDUMPING LAW

[U. S. C., title 19, sec. 160 and sec. 161 (a) (Antidumping Act, 1921)]

160. (a) Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury (hereinafter called the Secretary), after such investigation as he deems necessary, finds that an industry in the United States is being or is likely to be injured, or is prevented from being established, by reason of the importation into the United States of a class or kind of foreign merchandise, and that merchandise of such class or kind is being sold or is likely to be sold in the United States or elsewhere at less than its fair value, then he shall make such finding public to the extent he deems necessary, together with a description of the class or kind of merchandise to which it applies in such detail as may be necessary for the guidance of the appraising officers.

(b) Whenever, in the case of any imported merchandise of a class or kind as to which the Secretary has not so made public a finding, the appraiser or person acting as appraiser has reason to believe or suspect, from the invoice or other papers or from information presented to him, that the purchase price is less, or that the exporter's sales price is less or likely to be less, than the foreign market value (or, in the absence of such value, then the cost of production) he shall forthwith, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, notify the Secretary of such fact and withhold his appraisement report to the collector as to such merchandise until the further order of the Secretary, or until the Secretary has made public a finding as provided in subdivision (a) in regard to such merchandise.

161. (a) In the case of all imported merchandise, whether dutiable or free of duty, of a class or kind as to which the Secretary of the Treasury has made public a finding as provided in section 160 of this title, and as to which the appraiser or person acting as appraiser has made no appraisement report to the collector before such finding has been so made public, if the purchase price or exporter's sales price is less than the foreign market value (or, in the absence of such value, than the cost of production) there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties imposed thereon by law, a special dumping duty in an amount equal to such difference.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there is a law now on the statute books which penalizes imports from countries discriminating against United States commerce by imposing penalty duties. I refer to section 338 of the Tariff Act, and I ask unanimous consent that that section be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICAN COMMERCE

[U. S. C., title 19, sec. 1338 (a), (b), (d), and (e) (sec. 338, Tariff Act of 1930)]

(a) Additional duties: The President, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, shall by proclamation specify and declare new or additional duties as hereinafter provided upon articles wholly or in part the growth or product of, or imported in a vessel of, any foreign country whenever he shall find as a fact that such country—

(1) Imposes, directly or indirectly, upon the disposition in or transportation in transit through or reexportation from such country of any article wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States any unreasonable charge, exaction, regulation, or limitation which is not equally enforced upon the like articles of every foreign country; or

(2) Discriminates in fact against the commerce of the United States, directly or indirectly, by law or administrative regulation or practice, by or in respect to any customs, tonnage, or port duty, fee, charge, exaction, classification, regulation, condition, restriction, or prohibition, in such manner as to place the commerce of the United States at a disadvantage compared with the commerce of any foreign country.

(b) Exclusion from importation: If at any time the President shall find it to be a fact that any foreign country has not only discriminated against the commerce of the United States, as aforesaid, but has, after the issuance of a proclamation as authorized in subdivision (a) of this section, maintained or increased its said discriminations against the commerce of the United States, the President is hereby authorized, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, to issue a further proclamation directing that such products of said country or such articles imported in its vessels as he shall deem consistent with the public interests shall be excluded from importation into the United States.

* * * * * * *

(d) Duties to offset commercial disadvantages: Whenever the President shall find as a fact that any foreign country places any burden or disadvantage upon the commerce of the United States by any of the unequal impositions or discriminations aforesaid, he shall, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, by proclamation specify and declare such new or additional rate or rates of duty as he shall determine will offset such burden or disadvantage, not to exceed 50 percent ad valorem or its equivalent, on any products of, or on articles imported in a vessel of, such foreign country; and 30 days after the date of such proclamation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles enumerated in such proclamation when imported into the United States from such foreign country such new or additional rate or rates of duty; or, in case of articles declared subject to exclusion from importation into the United States under the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section, such articles shall be excluded from importation.

(e) Duties to offset benefits to third country: Whenever the President shall find as a fact that any foreign country imposes any unequal imposition or discrimination as aforesaid upon the commerce of the United States, or that any benefits accrue or are likely to accrue to any industry in any foreign country by reason of any such imposition or discrimination imposed by any foreign country other than the foreign country in which such industry is located, and whenever the President shall determine that any new or additional rate or rates of duty or any prohibition hereinbefore provided for do not effectively remove such imposition or discrimination, and that any benefits from any such imposition or discrimination accrue or are likely to accrue to any industry in any foreign country, he shall, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, by proclamation specify and declare such new or additional rate or rates of duty upon the articles wholly or in part the growth or product of any such industry as he shall determine will offset such benefits, not to exceed 50 percent ad valorem or its equivalent, upon importation from any foreign country into the United States of such articles; and on and after 30 days after the date of any such proclamation such new or additional rate or rates of duty so specified and declared in such proclamation shall be levied, collected, and paid upon such articles.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there is also an act prohibiting the importation of any article from a country which discriminates against the United States. I refer to section 804 of the revenue act. I ask unanimous consent that that section may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PEACETIME DISCRIMINATION AGAINST UNITED STATES PRODUCTS

[U. S. C., title 15, sec. 75 (sec. 804, Revenue Act of 1916)]

Whenever any country, dependency, or colony shall prohibit the importation of any article the product of the soil or industry of the United States and not injurious to health or morals, the President shall have power to prohibit, during the period such prohibition is in force, the importation into the United States of similar articles, or in case the United States does not import similar articles from that country, then other articles, the products of such country, dependency, or colony. * * *

Mr. LUCAS. There is another section under which clearance of vessels may be withheld. I refer to section 806 of the revenue act, and then there is section 337 of the tariff act under which imported goods benefiting from unfair-trade practices may be penalized by exclusion from entry. I ask unanimous consent that both sections may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WARTIME DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICAN COMMERCE—UNITED STATES NEUTRAL

[U. S. Code, title 15, sec. 77 (sec. 806, Revenue Act of 1916)]

Whenever, during the existence of a war in which the United States is not engaged, the President shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that any vessel, American or foreign, is, on account of the laws, regulations, or practices of a belligerent government, making or giving any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage in any respect whatsoever to any particular person, company, firm, or corporation, or any particular description of traffic in the United States or its possessions, or to any citizens of the United States residing in neutral countries abroad, or is subjecting any particular person, company, firm, or corporation, or any particular description of traffic in the United States or its possessions, or any citizens of the United States residing in neutral countries abroad to any undue or unreasonable prejudice, disadvantage, injury, or discrimination in regard to accepting, receiving, transporting, or delivering, or refusing to accept, receive, transfer, or deliver any cargo, freight, or passengers, or in any other respect whatsoever, he is authorized and empowered to direct the detention of such vessels by withholding clearance or by formal notice forbidding departure, and to revoke, modify, or renew any such direction.

Whenever, during the existence of a war in which the United States is not engaged, the President shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that under the laws, regulations, or practices of any belligerent country or government, American ships or American citizens are not accorded any of the facilities of commerce which the vessels or citizens of that belligerent country enjoy in the United States or its possessions, or are not accorded by such belligerent equal privileges or facilities of trade with vessels or citizens of any nationality other than that of such belligerent, the President is authorized and empowered to withhold clearance from one or more vessels of such belligerent country until such belligerent shall restore to such American vessels and American citizens reciprocal liberty of commerce and equal facilities of trade; or the President may direct that similar privileges and facilities, if any, enjoyed by vessels or citizens of such belligerent in the United States or its possessions be refused to vessels or citizens of such belligerent; and in such case he shall make proclamation of his direction, stating the facilities and privileges which shall be refused, and the belligerent to whose vessels or citizens they are to be refused, and thereafter the furnishing of such prohibited privileges and facilities to any vessel or citizen of the belligerent named in such proclamation shall be unlawful. * * *

UNFAIR PRACTICES IN IMPORT TRADE

[U. S. C., title 19, sec. 1337 (a) and (e) (sec. 337, Tariff Act of 1930)]

(a) Unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of articles into the United States, or in their sale by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of either, the effect or tendency of which is to destroy or substantially injure an industry, efficiently and economically operated, in the United States, or to prevent the establishment of such an industry, or to restrain or monopolize trade and commerce in the United States, are hereby declared unlawful, and when found by the President to exist shall be dealt with, in addition to any other provisions of law, as hereinafter provided.

* * * * * * *

(e) Whenever the existence of any such unfair method or act shall be established to the satisfaction of the President he shall direct that the articles concerned in such unfair methods or acts, imported by any person violating the provisions of this chapter, shall be excluded from entry into the United States, and upon information of such action by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the proper officers, refuse such entry. The decision of the President shall be conclusive.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to refer also to section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. In that act the Congress of the United States, in order to meet and adjust the very situation which the Senator from Wisconsin has been discussing, provided that quotas may be imposed on imports should they interfere with the Government's agricultural program. I ask unanimous consent that the section to which I have referred may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IMPORT SECTION OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT (OF 1933)

SEC. 22. (a) Whenever the President has reason to believe that any one or more articles are being or are practically certain to be imported into the United States under such conditions and in sufficient quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken, or to reduce substantially the amount of any product processed in the United States from any commodity subject to and with respect to which any program is in operation, under this title or the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, or section 32, Public Law No. 320, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 24, 1935, as amended, he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission, which shall give precedence to investigations under this section to determine such facts. Such investigation shall be made after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties and shall be conducted subject to such regulations as the President shall specify.

(b) If, on the basis of such investigation and report to him of findings and recommendations made in connection therewith, the President finds the existence of such facts, he shall by proclamation impose such fees on, or such limitations on the total quantities of, any article or articles which may be entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption as he finds and declares shown by such investigation to be necessary to prescribe in order that the entry of such article or articles will not render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken, or will not reduce substantially the amount of any product processed in the United States from any commodity subject to and with respect to which any program is in operation, under this title or the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, or section 32, Public Law No. 320, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 24, 1935, as amended: Provided, That no limitation shall be imposed on the total quantity of any article which may be imported from any country which reduces such permissible total quantity to less than 50 percent of the average annual quantity of such article which was imported from such country during the period from January 1, 1929, to December 31, 1933, both dates inclusive.

(c) The fees and import restrictions proclaimed by the President under this section and any revocation, suspension, or modification thereof, shall become effective on such date as shall be specified in such proclamation, revocation, suspension, or modification, and such fees, which shall not be in excess of 50 percent ad valorem, shall be treated for the purposes of all provisions of law relating to customs revenue as duties imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930.

(d) Any decision of the President as to facts under this section shall be final.

(e) After investigation, report, finding, and declaration in the manner provided in the case of a proclamation issued pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, any proclamation or provision of such proclamation may be suspended by the President whenever he finds that the circumstances requiring the proclamation or provision thereof no longer exist, or may be modified by the President whenever he finds that changed circumstances require such modification to carry out the purposes of this section (49 Stat. 773, sec. 31; 49 Stat. 1152, sec. 5; 50 Stat. 246, sec. 1; Act of Jan. 25, 1940, H. R. 7171, 76th Cong.).

Mr. LUCAS. I also ask to have incorporated in the RECORD section 5 (b) of the Trading With the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917, as amended.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

[U. S. C., title 12, sec. 95 (a) (sec. 5 (b), Trading With the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917, as amended)]

During time of war or during any other period of national emergency declared by the President, the President may, through any agency that he may designate, or otherwise, investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange, transfers of credit between or payments by banking institutions as defined by the President, and export, hoarding, melting, or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, by any person within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof; * * *.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from this summary, after it is read and studied, it would appear that ample authority already exists to control imports and to penalize the trade of any country which may discriminate against products of the United States.

The provisions of the pending amendment would place heavy burdens on American businessmen engaged in foreign trade by compelling them to register with the board and to secure licenses for both imports and exports. In my opinion the power to grant or withhold licenses would constitute a greater delegation of authority to the executive branch of the Government than has ever been made except in time of war.

I am absolutely and unalterably opposed to it on that ground.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if he can understand how any Senator or anybody else who is objecting to the main trade agreements joint resolution now sought to be continued, on the ground that it is an illegal and unconstitutional delegation of power, is willing to vote for a proposition such as this, which delegates to a committee of Cabinet officers set up the right to say to an American citizen who has 100 bales of cotton, or 1,000 bushels of wheat, or 20 hogs, that he cannot export them at all unless he goes down and pays $5 to this committee and obtains their permission to do it. It seems to me this is a so much greater delegation of power to this committee of Cabinet officers than the main trade-agreements resolution granted to the President of the United States there is no comparison whatever between them.

Mr. LUCAS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Missouri upon the question of delegation of power. After listening to the able arguments which were made by both sides on the Pittman amendment with respect to delegation of power, and then when I consider what this amendment does with respect to the delegation of legislative power over to the Executive, I am forced to agree with the Senator that there is more power delegated under this proposal than was complained of by those who argued in favor of the Pittman amendment. Mr. President, we may go back over the same arguments that have been made upon delegation of power, and we will find in the proposed delegation of power in the pending amendment no standards and no intelligible principle such as we have been discussing here from day to day—standards which are so necessary when power is delegated from one branch of the Government to the other.

Moreover, the Board, if established, would add appreciably to the cost of Government. It would be empowered "to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, experts, and employees as it deems necessary for the performance of its duties." To exercise so complete a control over foreign trade, that staff would necessarily be large.

Furthermore, the plan as proposed is administratively impractical. A board composed of five members of the Cabinet, each fully occupied with the activities of his department, would find little time to devote to these new duties which would affect so intimately and vitally the economic life of the American people.

The President already has adequate powers to protect the commerce of the United States, and with the renewal of the Trade Agreements Act he will have adequate powers to promote and increase that commerce.

That is the distinction, Mr. President. Under the present statute we now have power to protect our commerce. What we need in this country is the means to promote that commerce; and, in my humble opinion, the promotion of our commerce can be accomplished during the next 10 or 12 or 15 months only through extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

In the Tariff Commission, the State Department, and the Treasury the President has competent and trained personnel to advise and assist him in the exercise of these powers.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment because I am opposed to unnecessary impositions of burdensome restrictions and regulations, to indefensible duplications of governmental functions and personnel, and to unwarranted additions to the expense of government, as well as unwarranted delegation of power from the legislative to the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to say only a very few words upon this amendment.

In the first place, I agree very fully indeed with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in his picturization of some of the dangers which present themselves to the United States and to the trade of the United States in the present international situation. It is a situation which I recognized and pointed out during the debate on the Neutrality Act, when I pointed out that the people in some sections of the country were being misled by the hope of a tremendous war boom, with the idea that the warring powers in Europe would be anxious to purchase their wheat or their cotton or their cattle or something else. I pointed out then that Great Britain and other powers would desire to buy their cattle from Argentina and their airplanes and cartridges and guns from us.

If I correctly understand the object of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, frankly it has a laudable purpose. It is to create some Government agency to say to these nations, "If you are not going to pursue your ordinary trade with us, if you are not going to buy the tobacco and the apples and the other things that you have ordinarily been purchasing from us, if you are going to make no allowance for them, we will not sell you the war planes and the bombs and the gun sights and the military and naval secrets of the United States which you do want."

Mr. President, I sympathize with that purpose on the part of the Senator from Wisconsin; but I think such a measure as that has no place upon the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, because it has nothing to do with it. It is inconsistent with it, and is on an entirely different subject.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota in a moment.

Furthermore, as I said a moment ago, it is entirely inconceivable to me how anyone, who believed that the act itself which is now sought to be extended was an illegal and unconstitutional delegation of power, could possibly believe that such a proposition as that contained in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is not very much more so, because the amendment delegates and turns over to a committee of Cabinet members—not even to the President of the United States, but to a committee of Cabinet members—power to say to a man who has a hundred bales of cotton, or a thousand bushels of wheat, or 10 cattle, or 10 sheep, that he shall not export them unless he pays $5 and receives the consent of the committee.

I am glad now to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the repeal of the embargo on ammunition and implements of war had the same effect as if we had had a limited embargo on the exportation of other commodities from the United States, did it not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think there can be no question, Mr. President, that the net result of that repeal has been to throw the trade of the belligerents into countries in which they can negotiate purchases without cash payments, or with which they can make alliances which may possibly lead to their becoming allies in the actual hostilities, and greatly to exaggerate such trade as the war-plane and ammunition trade in the United States.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I further yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Great Britain having made trade treaties with her dominions under which she is obligated to buy agricultural commodities from them, and the United States having repealed the embargo, she gets ammunition, airplanes, and implements of war here——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And probably military secrets.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But continues to buy agricultural products from other countries.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. From Argentina or Turkey or anywhere else that may seem advantageous to her.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I have said all I wish to say. Much as I sympathize with the viewpoint expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin when he very cogently pointed out the dangerous situation which has been created for many American commodities, I do not believe this is either the proper method of reaching it or the proper measure to which to attach such an amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly in reply to the statements which have been made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

I am aware of the statutes which the Senator from Illinois has had incorporated in the RECORD as a part of his remarks, but the whole point of this amendment is missed if it is not clear that what it seeks to accomplish is to provide an instrumentality whereby we can protect the trade and the economy of the United States against the totalitarian devices of economic warfare which are being employed by all belligerents that are parties to the present conflict in Europe. Existing statutes, in my opinion, are not adequate for that purpose, nor do they enable the Government of the United States to carry out a program which will act effectively to accomplish the purposes which this amendment sets forth in section 2 (a) thereof.

Mr. President, it is always an effective device in debate to say that this is not the time or place to give consideration to a certain legislative proposal. I do think this amendment is entirely appropriate as an amendment to the pending joint resolution extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. It has been claimed in many quarters that the reciprocal-trade agreements are in and of themselves an effective means of coping with the totalitarian economic warfare which is being waged in the world today. I think any hope of trade agreements affording any such protection is doomed to tragic disappointment. As stated in my opening remarks, it is preposterous, it seems to me, to claim that the United States, which has initiated and promulgated this policy of reciprocal-trade agreements, will under any circumstances help to tear it down by denouncing the agreements and abrogating them.

To a large extent, so far as the duration of the war is concerned, this fight over the extension of the reciprocal-trade agreements is a sham battle. I do not believe there is any advocate of the reciprocal-trade agreements who would be so lacking in caution as to suggest that, in the economic situation which prevails in the world today in regard to the ever-changing wartime controls of trade and currency, and the depreciation of currency for international trade purposes, any substantial trade agreements are going to be negotiated while the war is in progress. If we are to act, we have to act now; we have to act before the canalization of trade as the result of these wartime controls has become crystallized.

Mr. President, I am not concerned about the delegation of power authorized in the amendment because the power could be exercised only when it was found that other countries were controlling their trade to the detriment of American export trade. Therefore the power to impose the provisions of import and export licenses could be utilized only in connection with a particular country which had acted through the use of control of trade, to the detriment of our own trade.

It is futile to make predictions, but, nevertheless, I make the prediction that if the war continues for any length of time the means to the end suggested in the amendment will seem to be mild in character. The problem of democratic nations today is to work out ways and means of devising democratic control of the necessary powers which will be required in order that we may protect the people of this country and the economy of this Nation in the world as it exists today.

Mr. President, I have no fear on the score that I shall ever have to regret the proposal for the creation of the power proposed to be created by the amendment. I have no doubt that the impact of war upon our economy will, before it is over, challenge the combined abilities of the American people in producing adequate measures under democratic control to protect the vital interests of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

WHITE BOOK PUBLISHED BY GERMAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, during last July Mr. H. J Haskell, managing editor of the Kansas City Star, together with other American newspapermen, visited Paris, and during that visit they called upon our Ambassador to France. In connection with the so-called German White Book, and the colloquies which have taken place in the Senate on that subject, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the desk a very brief editorial published in the Kansas City Star of March 30 with reference thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

BERLIN ISN'T IMPRESSIVE

As to those Polish documents published in Berlin, it may be observed in the first place that it is impossible to be sure they are authentic. If the Nazi Government felt anything was to be gained by doctoring the documents they would have been doctored—on the principles laid down in Mein Kampf—for the advantage of the fatherland.

If they are authentic they bear internal evidence of the inaccuracy of diplomatic reporting under the influence of wishful thinking. It is difficult to believe, for instance, that Ambassador Kennedy would have talked as foolishly as he is represented to have talked by the Polish commercial attaché in London.

On the report of the conversation of the Polish Ambassador in London with Ambassador Bullitt a direct bit of evidence may be offered. Mr. Bullitt is represented as saying that if war came the United States would not be in at the start, but would certainly help finish it.

Late last July a member of the Star's staff happened to be calling on the Ambassador in Paris with two other newspapermen. These two expressed the opinion that if there were war and it looked as if the Allies would lose, the United States probably would come to their rescue. Mr. Bullitt sharply disagreed. American sentiment, he said, was overwhelmingly for staying out of any war. He did not believe it would change. Further, he insisted that Americans who politely gave the French any such encouragement were doing France a disservice. He was constantly telling the French Foreign Office, he said, not to pay attention to such reports, for in his opinion American aid would not be forthcoming.

Of course the Star has no knowledge of what Mr. Bullitt may have said to the Polish Ambassador. But it seems exceedingly unlikely that he would have expressed views to the Pole so diametrically opposed to those he expressed to his American callers.

In view of such considerations as these, as well as the known attitude of the Government at Washington, we aren't impressed with the revelations in Berlin.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. Section 4 of such act of June 12, 1934, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. (a) Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to a Board composed of the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. The Board shall report to the President as soon as practicable its recommendations with respect to such agreement and such agreement shall not be concluded until such report is made. Before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

"(b) No such proposed agreement shall take effect until public hearings have been held by the Board with respect thereto and an opportunity afforded to all interested persons to present their views with respect to any matter contained therein, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. Notice of such hearings shall be published in the Federal Register not less than 30 days before such hearings are to commence and such notice shall contain the complete text of such proposed agreement. The Board shall report to the President as soon as practicable its recommendations with respect to any change in such proposed agreement that the Board may deem advisable; but no such change shall be made after the conclusion of the public hearings provided for in this subsection unless all persons interested in the proposed change were afforded an opportunity to be heard at such hearings with respect to such proposed change."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a reading of the amendment is really all that is necessary, for it makes its own argument. The question is whether or not the Congress desires to afford those persons who believe themselves to be directly affected by any proposed trade agreement to have an opportunity to be heard before a board composed of the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture upon the specific terms of the agreement.

There has been considerable time consumed in this debate by Senators indicating their dissatisfaction with the present method of conducting hearings, which, as we all know, are held prior to the time when any negotiations are undertaken, and the parties who are interested can appear and discuss the general situation affecting particular commodities.

This amendment would reverse that process and would make it possible for persons vitally affected by the trade agreements to be heard after knowing the terms the agreements are to contain with respect to the commodities in which they are interested. As I view it, the amendment does not in any respect curtail the power of the President, which the Senate has again and again refused to limit in any way; but if the amendment should become law it would afford every citizen who feels that he has an interest in a proposed trade agreement the right to appear and discuss the provisions of the agreement, which would be known in advance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand the amendment, it would prohibit the President from entering into any reciprocal-trade agreement unless the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, constituting the board under his amendment, should recommend that the agreement be entered into; and he would be prohibited from making such an agreement until they reported their recommendations to him. So probably two of these men could veto the entire power of the President to negotiate agreements at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is true, Mr. President—if the Senator can conceive of any such situation—that two members of the President's Cabinet, after holding a hearing, might refuse to make a report and recommendation to the President; but I think it is a preposterous assumption, if the Senator will pardon me for so characterizing it. All that is attempted to be done—and everyone knows that all that will be done—is to give persons who are vitally interested in a proposed trade agreement an opportunity to be heard before it is finally negotiated, instead of being invited to come in and give testimony in a general way upon a general subject matter. I think every Senator knows the difference between the procedure now in vogue and the one proposed in the amendment which would afford an opportunity for interested citizens to give testimony bearing on the actual economic effect of a particular rate upon a particular commodity in a proposed trade agreement. I do not see how anyone who believes in the democratic process and who believes in the right of petition and hearing can vote against this amendment. The amendment would not curtail the power of the President one iota, despite the suggestion made by the Senator from Kentucky, because we all know that no member of the President's official family would refuse to discharge his duty and responsibility.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Wisconsin very clearly covered the point I had in mind. I want to be certain that I correctly understand him. I do not understand that the President's powers would be curtailed in the slightest. All the amendment would do would be to call for hearings by the board and a report by the board to the President, after which the President could proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is absolutely correct. The board could recommend against completion of the negotiations if it so desired. The President would not have to give any consideration to its recommendation. There would be no curtailment of his power under the amendment, but it would set up a procedure under which the citizens of the United States and others vitally concerned by the trade agreements would have an opportunity to present their cases upon specific terms, knowing exactly what is proposed to be done, whereas now they have the privilege of coming in and discussing in general terms the economic situation and the competitive situation so far as the particular commodity is concerned. I am not a lawyer, Mr. President, but I feel satisfied that every lawyer in this body will agree with me that it is one thing to argue a general question and quite another thing to be able to present evidence and arguments upon a specific proposal. That is all the amendment provides for. For the life of me I cannot see why there should be any objection to it, unless it be an objection based on fear that public opinion might be aroused.

Mr. President, I do not think that argument ought to have one feather's weight in the consideration by Senators of this amendment. If the trade agreements are defensible, and if the particular negotiations are sound, they can stand the light of day and test of argument before they are finally negotiated. We might just as well say that we would not have any public hearings on an important bill because public sentiment might be aroused about it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The State Department has put great emphasis upon the approval it has received from the American Farm Bureau Federation in connection with the trade-treaty program. It has been very proud of the attitude of the American Farm Bureau Federation. However, my recollection is that the American Farm Bureau Federation's proposal was limited to a requirement for obtaining the agreement of three Cabinet officers before a trade agreement should become effective. I judge that the purpose of the American Farm Bureau Federation in asking for that check is precisely the objective which the Senator from Wisconsin is trying to reach.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The part of the amendment which sets up the board composed of the Secretaries of Commerce, Agriculture, and State is in complete harmony with the position taken by the representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation and the position taken by Mr. Thatcher, representing the National Farmers Union. Their minimum demand, as I understood it, was the creation of a board which would have to make recommendations to the President, the board to be composed of the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce. But, Mr. President, the amendment further provides—as Senators will observe if they will read paragraph (b) on page 2—an opportunity for a hearing before the board upon the specific terms of a proposed agreement.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand the amendment from reading it hurriedly, it seems to me that the officials of the State Deartment who are empowered to negotiate are not compelled to take into consideration the views of those who may be heard in protest, no matter how reasonable they may be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I know of no way in the world in which by statute we can compel the consideration of evidence presented unless we provide for judicial review; but I think that a legislator must assume that there will be a reasonably sympathetic compliance with legislation which is enacted. If we do not make that assumption we might as well not pass any legislation at all. I think it follows logically that if such hearings are held, the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture will give consideration to the testimony presented, and that if they are impressed with its validity they will in good faith recommend to the President that some further negotiation be had in respect to any item contained in the proposed agreement which the testimony has indicated was not properly worked out.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If we can assume what the Senator says we can assume, then, there can be no objection to his amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I cannot see how anybody could object to it, because in the present situation there is no opportunity for the citizens of Minnesota or any other State to give testimony and be heard after the terms of a proposed trade agreement are known. They are now heard upon general notice that certain commodities may be the subject of negotiation, but the greatest secrecy surrounds the whole proceeding from the time the hearing is concluded until the agreement is promulgated. All I seek to do is to give the people of this country who are interested in various commodities and vitally concerned with what is done about them, an opportunity for a decent, fair, American hearing.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator's amendment presuppose that the authority heretofore delegated has not been exercised in such a way as to give the people of the country a real opportunity to be heard when their interests are affected?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have explained over and over again what opportunity they now have. There is nothing implied in the amendment except that I seek to provide what I think is a better procedure.

The Senator knows, as everybody knows, that when they are going to negotiate a trade agreement with country A, they announce that in that negotiation certain commodities from A to M may be taken under consideration, and then persons interested may come before the Committee for Reciprocity Information and be given a hearing about the general situation which exists so far as a particular commodity in which the citizen is interested is concerned. What I propose to do is to reverse this program, let them proceed upon the basis of their present information to enter into the negotiations and, when they have arrived at a tentative agreement, to make it public in the Federal Register, and then let any interested party come before the board composed of the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and present his testimony in relation to the specific items of the proposed agreement.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. CHANDLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in the Senator's amendment I notice that he provides that the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce shall sit as a board for the purposes of these hearings. That would be all right. It seems to me, however, that this possible criticism might be directed to that sort of a board: All three of these men, I suppose, are pretty busy, and I was wondering whether the hearings might not be so long that it would be impracticable for these three men to sit as a board. My thought was that without changing the Senator's idea, in the event it was not feasible because the hearings would go on for months, if some way were provided in the amendment whereby a board in lieu of the board suggested, but to do what the Senator proposes to be done—namely, to sit and hear the testimony—could be provided as an alternative, it might make the amendment a little more workable, at least in my idea.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I say to the Senator from Maryland that I rather carefully considered that phase of the matter. I do not know whether or not the Senator is aware of it, but there has been considerable criticism that the present hearings are held before representatives on the Reciprocity Committee instead of before the men who are in charge of the various departments.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I also heard the Senator from Colorado say, in the course of his remarks on the matter, that he was given an opportunity to be heard before this Committee, and went away again. There has been some criticism, I may say.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator is directing his attention to one of the weaknesses in the present procedure; namely, that there is not an opportunity for a hearing. My only thought was that if the Secretaries of State and Commerce and Agriculture were compelled to sit every day for perhaps a month or 6 weeks, the plan might not be as feasible as it appears to be in the amendment.

I was wondering whether the Secretary of State, out of the personnel that assists him, could not set up such a board to hear complaints, both before the treaty is promulgated, perhaps, and afterward too, if it is deemed wise, with the sole thought in making this suggestion to the author of the amendment that in that way perhaps he would get a greater amount of facility in the hearings than he would get if these three Cabinet officers had to be assembled together. If the hearings should go on for 2 months, I am afraid perhaps the plan suggested would not be feasible.

I have not explored the matter, but that is an idea which I thought perhaps might be pertinent to this discussion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it is pertinent to it; and I do not want the Senator from Maryland for a moment to think I did not give that matter consideration.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But one of the complaints and criticisms which prompted the offering of this amendment was that it was only before representatives of various heads of departments that persons were given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will further yield, of course I have not given the subject the study the Senator from Wisconsin has. I do not want to give hostages to fortune; but at this stage of the discussion, at least, I think I should look pretty favorably upon the amendment, unless some subsequent discussion shows that my position is unwise—I have not considered it at great length—if the Senator were to provide, in substance, that an interested person should have an opportunity to present his views to a board to be designated by the Secretary of State under such rules and regulations as he or the President may prescribe. It seems to me that such a board would become, over the period of a year, pretty much of a permanent institution, to which persons could complain, and it would be under the head of the very Department that is negotiating the treaties, and, in my judgment, would considerably conduce to smooth hearings and efficiency in the conduct thereof.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I understand from private advices I have received that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is about ready to conclude the day's labors. I shall be very glad to have an opportunity to think this matter over, and perhaps to discuss it with the Senator; but I want once more to emphasize the fact that a very large body of opinion has been expressed to the effect that the heads of these other Departments ought to be brought into the consideration of these important matters which affect our entire economy.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield at that point?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think a great deal may be said for the necessity of hearings. Without examining into the matter, it appeals to me as an offhand proposition. My only thought was that in place of these three Cabinet officers there might be a man from each of the three Departments, perhaps; but I still believe that if the matter is left up to three Cabinet officers there will be no hearings, because they will not be able to get together long enough to hold the hearings which are necessary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be very glad now to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. III—TREASURY AND OTHER DEPARTMENTS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 681)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

When I submitted reorganization plans I and II at the last regular session of Congress I indicated that certain reorganizations of an intradepartmental character were necessary, but that detailed study would be required for the preparation of specific plans. Since that time the heads of the executive departments and my own office have continued to study the internal organization of the several agencies of the Government. I have considered recommendations made to me as a result of these studies and have found it possible to make a number of needed improvements of organization by administrative action. In other instances I can effect the necessary changes only under the procedure set up in the Reorganization Act of 1939.

I am transmitting herewith Reorganization Plan III, which I have prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the Reorganization Act of 1939 (Public, No. 19, 76th Cong., 1st sess.), approved April 3, 1939; and I declare that with respect to each reorganization made in this plan I have found that such reorganization is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes of section 1 (a) of the act:

1. To reduce expenditures;
2. To increase efficiency;
3. To consolidate agencies according to major purposes;
4. To reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions and by abolishing such as may not be necessary; and
5. To eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

Treasury Department: I am proposing two intradepartmental reorganizations relating to the Treasury Department.

The first reorganization consolidates in a Fiscal Service, under the direction of a permanent Fiscal Assistant Secretary, those functions of the Treasury Department pertaining to financing and fiscal activities. This Fiscal Service will bring together the Office of the Treasurer of the United States, the Office of Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits, and the Public Debt Service, including their various subdivisions, and certain other related functions.

Some adjustments are made in the assignment of functions of the units which will comprise the Fiscal Service and certain changes are made in titles. The net effect of these adjustments is to establish within the Fiscal Service the Office of Fiscal Assistant Secretary, the Office of the Treasurer of the United States, and a Bureau of Accounts under a Commissioner of Accounts, and a Bureau of Public Debt under the Commissioner of Public Debt. In addition to responsibility for the administration of these four segments of the Department's operations, the Fiscal Assistant Secretary is vested with the financing functions of the Under Secretary of the Treasury and of the Assistant Secretaries.

The functions brought together in the Fiscal Service are all closely interrelated and are essential parts of the general functions of financing and fiscal control. The internal organization of the Fiscal Service conforms to accepted principles of financial management and provides the framework for adequate internal controls. At the same time, under the proposed plan these functions can be coordinated more effectively, duplications eliminated, and a more efficient service provided. To assure continued effective management of this highly important and technical phase of the Treasury functions, I am placing the Fiscal Service under the supervision of a career official. The plan, therefore, provides that the Fiscal Assistant Secretary will be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with civil-service laws and will perform his duties under the general direction of the Secretary. This is in accord with the policy of this administration of bringing higher administrative positions within the career service. The creation of the office of Fiscal Assistant Secretary will not increase the number of Assistant Secretaries in the Treasury Department, since the plan expressly provides for the abolition of one of the three existing offices of Assistant Secretary.

The second reorganization affecting the Treasury Department vests in the Secretary of the Treasury full authority for the administration of the Federal Alcohol Administration Act. At present the Federal Alcohol Administration occupies an anomalous position. It is legally a part of the Treasury Department, but actually it is clothed with almost complete independence under existing statutory provisions. Under certain conditions the administration would by law become an independent agency, whereas the interests of improved management require its integration with allied activities in the Treasury Department.

I propose, therefore, that the functions of the Federal Alcohol Administration be correlated with the activities of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, particularly its Alcohol Tax Unit. The Bureau is already performing a large part of the field enforcement work of the Administration and could readily take over complete responsibility for its work. The Bureau is daily making, for other purposes, a majority of the contacts with units of the liquor industry which the Federal Alcohol Administration should but cannot make without the establishment of a large and duplicating field force. Under the provisions of this plan, it will be possible more effectively to utilize the far-flung organization of the Treasury Department, including its many laboratories, in discharging the functions of the Federal Alcohol Administration. Thus I find the proposed consolidation will remedy deficiencies in organization structure as well as afford a more effective service at materially reduced costs.

Department of the Interior: Reorganization Plan II transferred the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior and thus concentrated in one department the two bureaus responsible for the conservation and utilization of the wildlife resources of the Nation. On the basis of experience gained since this transfer, I find it necessary and desirable to consolidate these units into a single bureau to be known as the Fish and Wildlife Service.

The Bureau of Biological Survey administers Federal laws relating to birds, land mammals, and amphibians whereas the Bureau of Fisheries deals with fishes, marine mammals, and other aquatic animals. The natural areas of operation of these two Bureaus frequently coincide, and their activities are interrelated and similar in character. Consolidation will eliminate duplication of work, facilitate coordination of programs, and improve service to the public.

Another provision relating to the Department of the Interior is the abolition of the statutory office of Recorder of the General Land Office. This office is a relic of the quill and sand-box period in the transcription of land records. Its duties can readily be absorbed by the regular civil-service personnel of the Land Office.

Department of Agriculture: I propose to consolidate the Division of Marketing and Marketing Agreements of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation into a single agency to be known as the Surplus Marketing Administration. This consolidation will facilitate the work of the Department of Agriculture relating to the formulation and administration of marketing agreements and the disposition of agricultural surpluses.

Because the two programs require unified planning and direction, the Secretary of Agriculture has found it desirable to designate the same person as the head of both. In one capacity he reports directly to the Secretary of Agriculture, while in the other he is responsible by law to the Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Consolidation of the two units will assure unified management, eliminate confusion in administration, and make for more efficient operation. Furthermore, this reorganization will remove from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration the legal responsibility for functions which differ administratively from its major operations.

Department of Labor: I propose to abolish the offices of commissioner of immigration and the offices of district commissioner of immigration and naturalization. The former have been vacant since 1933; the latter impose an unnecessary level of supervision above that of district director of immigration and naturalization in certain of our ports and should be eliminated in the interests of economy and sound administration.

Civil Aeronautics Authority: I propose to clarify the relations of the Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the five-member Board of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. The Administrator is made the Chief Administrative Officer of the Authority with respect to all functions other than those relating to economic regulation and certain other activities primarily of a rule-making and adjudicative character, which are entrusted to the Board. This will eliminate the confusion of responsibilities existing under the Civil Aeronautics Act and provide a more clear-cut and effective plan of organization for the agency.

Improvement and savings: The principal advantage of the reorganizations proposed in this plan will be increased effectiveness of operation of the agencies concerned. In addition to improved service, some economies may be expected. I estimate that immediate annual savings in administrative expense of approximately $150,000 will result. This comparatively small amount in no way measures the worth of the proposals. In fact, if they resulted in no administrative savings at all, I should still consider them worth while in view of the increased effectiveness of administration that will result.

Need for continuous study: The management problems of a department or agency are complex and dynamic and require much detailed analysis before findings can be made. These problems cannot be resolved by any one reorganization plan, nor at one time; their study must be a continuing process if our departmental machinery is to keep pace with the changing requirements placed on the Government. Accordingly, in conformity with the Budget and Accounting Act, I have instructed the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to continue studies in collaboration with the several departments and agencies, looking to further improvements in the Government's administrative structure.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 2, 1940.

Reorganization Plan No. III, accompanying the President's message, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. III

(Prepared by the President and transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, April 2, 1940, pursuant to the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1939, approved April 3, 1939)

(d) Abolition of an office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury: That office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury which is now vacant is hereby abolished; and all the functions, rights, powers, and duties of such abolished office are hereby transferred to and vested in the Fiscal Assistant Secretary, to be exercised by him under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Federal Alcohol Administration: The Federal Alcohol Administration, the offices of the members thereof, and the office of the Administrator are abolished, and their functions shall be administered under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury through the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the Department of the Treasury.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 8. Transfer of records, property, and personnel: All records and property (including office equipment) of the several agencies, and all records and property used primarily in the administration of any functions, transferred or consolidated by this plan and all the personnel used in the administration of such agencies and functions (including officers whose chief duties relate to such administration and whose offices are not abolished) are transferred or consolidated, as the case may be, within the department or agency concerned, for use in the administration of the agencies and functions transferred or consolidated by this plan: Provided, That any personnel transferred or consolidated within any department or agency by this section found by the head of such department or agency to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the administration of the functions transferred or consolidated shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government service, or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer: Provided, That the use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT JUDGES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, if it will not interfere with the pending business, and is agreeable to the leaders on both sides, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the pending business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of calendar number 1377, House bill 7079, to provide for the appointment of additional district and circuit judges.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what the bill provides.

Mr. HATCH. It relates to the creation of certain additional judgeships. The bill has been pending for over a year. It was passed by the Senate over a year ago and went to the House, the House passed its own bill and sent it to the Senate, and the measure I am asking to have taken up is the House bill, which is practically identical with the bill the Senate passed more than a year ago.

Mr. REED. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. I did not clearly understand the request of the Senator from New Mexico. There were so many Senators standing and talking that we on this side could neither see nor hear the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. I am asking to lay aside temporarily the pending business, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7079.

Mr. REED. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HATCH. Will not the Senator withhold his objection? Does he understand the nature of the bill I am seeking to have taken up?

Mr. REED. If it is the judicial bill which we had under consideration at the last regular session, or its counterpart, as amended by the House, I think I understand it, because I occupied the floor of the Senate on that bill much of a day in the absence of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is correct; this is a judicial bill, creating certain additional judgeships, but it is the same bill we passed last year.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I serve notice that at the first opportunity I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1377, House bill 7079, to provide for the appointment of additional district and circuit judges.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment go over until tomorrow, and that beginning after the approval of the Journal tomorrow no Senator shall speak on the amendment more than once nor longer than 15 minutes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I understood that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] had an amendment to offer, which he might wish to explain at some length, and I was wondering whether the proposal of the Senator from Mississippi would interfere with that.

Mr. HARRISON. I have presented the request so that we can get through about 1 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there was so much confusion that I did not hear the request.

Mr. HARRISON. The request was that tomorrow, beginning after the approval of the Journal, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes on the pending amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Just on the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Just on the amendment.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, did the Senator say that would relate only to the pending amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair ask, Does that mean that there will be no debate on the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. There will be no debate on the bill itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SENATOR VANDENBERG'S PROPOSAL FOR A FOREIGN-TRADE BOARD—ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, during my temporary absence from the floor the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] secured consent to publish in the RECORD a rather bitter attack on my foreign-trade views by Mr. Walter Lippmann. It is an article whose conclusions, in my judgment, are as completely unwarranted by the facts as anyone could hope to contrive, and it is ill-tempered and ill-founded. In my judgment, it scarcely deserves the dignity of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but even had I been present I should not have objected. I merely wish to have this statement appear in the RECORD in connection with the publication of the contribution by the distinguished junior Senator from Mississippi.

AMENDMENT OF EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION ACT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 607) to amend section 40 of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, which was, on page 2, line 16, to strike out all after "Act." down to and including "hereof.", in line 20, and insert "Claim on account of disability or death of any person coming within the purview of the first section hereof, for benefits on account of injury incurred subsequent to July 28, 1935, may be filed under said act: Provided, That such claim be filed within 1 year after the approval hereof."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States, submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE—JOHN RUSSELL YOUNG

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported favorably the nomination of John Russell Young, of the District of Columbia, to be a Commissioner of the District of Columbia for a term of 3 years and until his successor is appointed and qualified, vice George E. Allen, resigned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Matthew F. McGuire to be the Assistant to the Attorney General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the desire that this officer take the oath of office tomorrow and enter upon the performance of his duties, I ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be immediately notified.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the appointment by President Roosevelt of Matthew F. McGuire, of Massachusetts, to the post of the Assistant to the Attorney General marks another important step in the development of the merit system instituted by Attorney General Robert H. Jackson in the Department of Justice.

The recommendation for the promotion of Mr. McGuire by the Attorney General followed 6 years' continued wide and diversified experience in the Department. Mr. McGuire is thoroughly familiar with the personnel and workings of the Department, and for the past year has been serving in the capacity of Special Assistant Attorney General.

The duties of the latter office will be combined with duties of the new post, and will embrace appointments and legislation in which the Department is interested, and Mr. McGuire will act as liaison officer between the Attorney General and Congress and other agencies and departments of the Federal Government. In addition, he will handle confidential and special legal and administrative matters pertaining to the Washington office and to the offices of the United States attorneys and marshals elsewhere.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William M. Lindsay to be United States marshal for the district of Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James Earl Evans to be postmaster at Carrollton, Mo., which had been reported adversely.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that this nomination may go over for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters reported favorably be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc. That concludes the executive calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 3, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 2, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Christ of Galilee, we beseech Thee to hear us while we humbly wait at the altar of prayer; O spirit pure and holy, possess these hearts of ours. Hold to our lips the Holy Grail that from the blessed cup we may drink deep of the water of life. Instead of the vexing voice of regrets, fill our hearts with happy memories of the Bethels where our heavenly Father appeared and blessed us. In grateful recollection stay our minds in the great peace of them who love Thy law and whom nothing shall offend. Remember those who are in weariness and in pain. Draw them closer to Thee and breathe Thy loving spirit into every troubled breast. Bless them upon whom lie the responsibilities of the social, the commercial, and the political life of the world. Summon their souls to fight the good fight with soldiery courage. O bridge the great gulfs of discord, wherein the clanging cymbals of hate and tyranny are in defiant swing. In the name of the Saviour of men. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a brief personal statement to the House.

I dislike very much to do so, but, unfortunately, a few weeks ago I contracted a very severe case of influenza which seems to be holding on to me with great tenacity. My physician has advised me to take a little rest, and I am sure the Members of the House will be pleased to accord me this privilege.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 451

Resolved, That Hon. SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas, be, and he is hereby, elected Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

Resolved, That the President and the Senate be notified by the Clerk of the election of Hon. SAM RAYBURN as Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that for the remainder of this week the Committee on Agriculture may be permitted to sit during sessions of the House.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, I rise to say I noticed in the RECORD where the Committee on Military Affairs of the House or any subcommittee thereof has the right to sit for the remainder of this week during sessions of the House. I think it is a very grave mistake to have the legislative committee that handles legislation affecting the War Department in session in the afternoon at the time when we are going to consider the War Department appropriation bill. I hope the members of the Military Affairs Committee will recognize the necessity of being on the floor during the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs made the request referred to, but I am sure I am well within the truth when I say that a subcommittee is meeting only today and, perhaps, tomorrow, for the purpose of considering the T. V. A. tax legislation, and I am also quite sure there is no intention on the part of the members of that committee to be away from the floor when the War Department appropriation bill is being considered.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am pleased to hear that because I believe we are entitled to information the members of the committee may give us during the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. THOMASON. I agree with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]?

There was no objection.

WHERE THIS ADMINISTRATION GETS THE MONEY

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, Thomas Jefferson once said:

If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issue of their currency, first by inflation and then by deflation, the banks and the corporations that will grow up around them will deprive the people of all their property until their children will wake up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered.

These were prophetic words. While the private banks do not directly control the issue of our currency the Federal Government is cooperating with them to such an extent that we are now in the midst of a mild inflation that is reflected in disturbed business conditions.

Since February 28, 1939, to March 1, 1940, the Federal stock of money has increased $4,004,519,182 or $5.12 per capita. The total being $26,339,210,454. Money actually in circulation increased from $6,731,243,857 or $51.44 per capita to $7,455,097,341 or $56.56 per capita. The actual increase in circulation amounting to only $723,853,484.

Thus while the assets were increased over four billion only one-sixth was actually put into the channels of credit and trade. If the entire sum had been put in circulation the new money would have been greater than the money in circulation June 30, 1914.

Soon the printing-press money may be turned out as fast as it was in Germany in 1919. If so you know what will happen. A dictator after bankruptcy. Loss of our form of Government. A terrible price to pay for a New Deal. How about chasing the money changers out of the temple?

America, beware of unregulated inflation.

FLOODS IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

THE SPEAKER

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is with great regret we learn you have not entirely recovered from your recent attack of influenza. I am sure I speak not only for this side of the House but for the entire membership when I express the hope for a pleasant trip to your beloved Southland. May you, in the warmth of the South, soon be restored to health and come back to us in perfect vigor, ready for the strenuous balance of this session. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in connection with the Americanization work being done by the David Wisted Post of the American Legion, of Duluth, Minn., including a short statement prepared by the post indicating the steps taken in that valuable work.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE CENSUS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, in keeping with the provisions of the Constitution, the Bureau of the Census of the Department of Commerce today has 130,000 enumerators calling on the citizens of this country, the purpose of which is to secure facts that will enable the Government to prepare statistics relative to population, agriculture, housing, incomes, and so forth.

There came to my desk a few days ago a blank form that was sent to me by the supervisor of the district where I reside in the city of St. Louis. Although interrupted by a telephone call, within 5 minutes I had filled out the form and it was in the mail. No question was asked me that I would not have been willing for the information to be made public.

Although the census has been taken every 10 years since 1790, this is the first time, so far as I can learn, that a Member of either branch of Congress has advised the citizens of this country to refuse to give certain information to census enumerators.

I want to recite a little of my own experience in dealing with the Census Bureau which should convince anyone that the Government looks upon the information as confidential and no one other than the citizen can secure a statement relative to the answer given to the enumerator.

Everyone will admit there is no harm in the public knowing the age of a man, woman, or child, but still no Member of Congress can secure that information from the Census Bureau unless the party involved makes the request. Hundreds of applicants for old-age assistance in my city have been unable to submit proper evidence as to their age because vital statistics were not kept at the time they were born. The Social Security Commission of Missouri will accept the official record of the Census Bureau showing the age given in the enumeration 30, 40, or 50 years ago, but I cannot secure that information unless I have a request from the applicant.

I merely mention this to show that, no matter what information is given to the enumerator, it will not be made public.

As far as the enumerators in my congressional district are concerned, I do not know who they are. Twelve hundred residents of the district made application to take the examination for 250 positions, and everyone was given an opportunity to take the examination. Following that examination, the enumerators were selected, but, regardless of who those enumerators are, I feel they are law-abiding citizens of this country and will not divulge any of the information that any resident of the district might give them. Of course, the district supervisor informed them of the penalties provided by law, to which they are subject, if they divulge any of the information received.

Under the act of May 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 292), the Department of Commerce is authorized to make special statistical studies upon payment of the cost thereof. The law further provides that a report must be made to Congress concerning these special statistics studies, compilations, and so forth, and the amount charged for the service. That report is received annually. It is referred to the Committee on Expenditures of which I am chairman. Now, what does it contain? It lists the names of hundreds of businessmen, corporations, partnerships, societies, publishing companies, insurance companies that asked for certain statistics. Do the employees of the applicant review the records on file in the Census Bureau? No; the civil-service employee of the Government in the Census Bureau prepares the statistics and the charge is made in keeping with the length of time it takes to gather the statistics. What do they ask for? I cite some of the requests. How many grocery and combination stores in Indianapolis, number of drug stores in Columbus, Ohio, amount of sales of paint, varnish, and so forth, number of establishments producing chemicals by States, tabulation on storage batteries, value of polo or sport shirts manufactured, tabulation on the consumption of flour and bread and other bakery products, Japanese population in certain districts, statistics on the manufacture of paper and pulp, value of preserves, jams, jellies, and fruit butters, statistics on consumption of corn sirup, consumption of fuel oil, hundreds of requests in reference to imports of various articles in this country as well as exports, including everything from paris green to malt and distilled liquors. Is there anything wrong about that?

All information compiled by the Census Bureau, under the act of May 27, 1935, is statistics and paid for. Information required by citizens as to their age is given to the applicant without charge, to which, of course, no one would object.

I simply mention this to show how careful the Census Bureau is in keeping confidential the information that it has secured in the past and will secure during the taking of the present census.

The Director of the Census, Hon. William L. Austin, a career man with a civil-service status, has been connected with the Census Bureau for over 40 years and he tells me that not once can he recall where any employee of the Census Bureau was ever discharged or prosecuted for giving out information secured in the taking of the census.

Anyone who is familiar with the census certainly should not try and arouse the people or interfere with the duty of Government officials who are carrying out the provisions, not of an act of Congress, but of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

WAR PROPAGANDA MUST BE FOUGHT

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in the House of Representatives a resolution to appoint a special committee to investigate war propaganda in the United States. The resolution proposes an investigation of, first, the extent, character, and objects of war-propaganda activities in the United States; second, the dissemination, written or oral, from foreign countries or from within this country, of propaganda or news items, radio broadcasts, motion pictures, or other media which are calculated or intended to draw the United States into a foreign war or to create internal strife; third, any and all activities of belligerents, individuals, groups, organizations, or corporations which have for their purpose, direct or indirect, to involve this Nation in war; and, fourth, all other questions in relation to war propaganda that would aid Congress in any necessary remedial legislation to protect and preserve the neutrality of the United States and to keep this Nation at peace.

The seriousness of the situation resulting from the dissemination of war propaganda in the United States cannot be overemphasized. Much propaganda material appears in the newspapers; it is heard over the radio; it is mailed to the office and the home; it comes to the desks of Members of Congress every day. How much of this information is false cannot be gaged by the average person. Needless to say, much of this propaganda is a skillful misrepresentation of facts; some of it has an element of deceit in it; some of it is a deliberate statement of untruth, and most of it can be characterized as a vicious and vile fraud upon the American people. We, as Members of Congress, should take immediate steps to eradicate this evil.

The American citizens suffered severely during the last war, and the sick and ailing veterans show us, stronger than words, that we are still suffering from the effects of that war. One of the chief factors that led us into the World War was propaganda. Let us avoid a repetition of that mistake.

As Americans, we must vigorously oppose the war propagandists who will try, by fair means or foul, to induce this Nation to wage war. We want no part of war and its hateful consequences. We must fight with all our hearts to remain neutral, and at peace.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities I present a privileged report and ask that the Clerk read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 1904]

The Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities authorized by the House of Representatives by House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, caused to be issued a subpena directing one George Powers to appear before the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and to produce all records regarding Communist Party and activities, the subpena being set forth in words and figures, as follows:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, to the Sergeant at Arms, or his special messenger, you are hereby commanded to summon manager and/or custodian of office of Communist Party of west Pennsylvania, room 406, McCance Building, Pittsburgh, Pa., to be and appear before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Honorable MARTIN DIES is chairman, and to bring with you all records, documents, and files pertaining to the Communist Party which are in your possession and under your control in their chamber in the city of Washington, on forthwith, at the hour of forthwith, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee. Herein fail not, and make return of this summons. Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 25th day of March 1940. W. B. BANKHEAD, Speaker. Attest: South Trimble, Clerk.

Said subpena was on March 26, 1940, served upon the said George Powers by George F. Hurley, an employee of the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and duly authorized to serve the said subpena, the return of a service by the said George F. Hurley being endorsed thereon which is set forth in words and figures, as follows:

Subpena for George Powers, manager and custodian of office of Communist Party of west Pennsylvania, room 406, McCance Building Pittsburgh, Pa., before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities. Served by George F. Hurley, investigator, March 26, 1940. Sergeant at Arms, House of Representatives.

Said George Powers, pursuant to said subpena and in compliance therewith, appeared before the said committee to give such testimony and to produce such records as required under and by virtue of House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress.

Said George Powers, after being duly sworn by the chairman, gave testimony before the said committee on the 28th day of March 1940 concerning certain matters and things, but refused to give testimony and to answer certain questions propounded to him on the following matters and things:

"The CHAIRMAN. I will frame the question this way: Are your brothers likewise members of the Communist Party of the United States?

"Mr. COHN. May I say to the court that that objection similarly covers the personal question of the chairman.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then, on advice of your counsel you decline to state whether or not your two brothers are members of the Communist Party of the United States?

"Mr. COHN. He so declines.

"Mr. LYNCH. Wait a minute. Let the witness do the declining.

"Mr. POWERS. I decline.

"Mr. LYNCH. Then I ask the Chair to direct him to answer.

"Mr. COHN. You have it on record. He said he declines.

"Mr. LYNCH. Wait a minute. I ask the chairman to direct him to answer the question.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is a formality. The witness is instructed to answer to the question as to whether or not his two brothers are now members of the Communist Party of the United States.

"Mr. LYNCH. Repeat your answer.

"Mr. POWERS. I decline to answer the question." (March 28, 1940, record, pp. 17–18.)

"The CHAIRMAN. Now, in connection with the Communist Party——

"Mr. LYNCH. Excuse me. Will the record show there is a quorum of the committee present when this question was asked?

"The CHAIRMAN. When the Chair began the deliberations this morning, a subcommittee was appointed because we did not have a quorum present, but at the time this question was asked a full quorum is present—Mr. VOORHIS, Mr. DEMPSEY, the chairman, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. MASON.

"You likewise decline to answer the question as to whether or not your brothers are now in the United States? I want the record to be complete on that. Is that true?

"Mr. POWERS. I decline to give any information about anyone except myself." (March 28, 1940, record, p. 18.)

"The CHAIRMAN. I am asking you a question. State the name of the person under you in the organization whom you testified was in charge of the record of the payment of dues. Now answer that question.

"Mr. POWERS. You see——

"The CHAIRMAN. No; answer the question; the name of the person.

"Mr. POWERS. I will not give you any names of any people, because you are trying to build up a blacklist.

"The CHAIRMAN. All right. You are directed to answer——

"Mr. POWERS. Because you are blacklisting. I will prove it by MARTIN DIES' statement.

"The CHAIRMAN. Let the record show that the witness has declined to answer the question asked by the chairman.

"Mr. POWERS. Due to the fact that Mr. DIES is trying to blacklist our people in industry. That is why we are not going to supply ammunition for him, or Tom Girdler, either." (March 29, 1940, record, pp. 34–35.)

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the names of the members, or as many members as you can, of the district committee?

"Mr. POWERS. For fear of the blacklist, I will not state any.

"The CHAIRMAN. You are directed by the Chair to do so, and you decline to do so; is that correct?

"Mr. POWERS. I consider your question answered." (March 28, 1940, record, pp. 37–38.)

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the names of the secretaries of the branches that you know?

"Mr. POWERS. Most of our secretaries work in mills and mines, and I will not turn over any names to such a committee as this.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs you to state the names of the secretaries of those branches, and you decline to do so?

"Mr. POWERS. I decline to do so for the statement I made a minute ago. I decline to do so for reasons——" (March 28, 1940, record, p. 40.)

"Mr. LYNCH. I want to put the question specifically. Give us the name of the man who would be in charge of issuing membership books in the Communist Party in your area.

"Mr. POWERS. I told you that I wouldn't give you any names of any people.

"Mr. LYNCH. You refuse to give that name?

"Mr. POWERS. Because of the——

"Mr. LYNCH. Wait a minute. Do you refuse to give that name?

"Mr. POWERS. I refuse to give any name for the purpose of——

"The CHAIRMAN. That is enough.

"Mr. LYNCH. Do you refuse to give that name?

"Mr. POWERS. What name?

"Mr. LYNCH. The name I just asked you, of the man who issues the membership card book.

"Mr. POWERS. What membership card book?

"Mr. LYNCH. Such as the one just shown you; membership in the Communist Party.

"Mr. POWERS. I tell you——

"Mr. LYNCH. I am asking you if you will give us the name of the man who issues the membership card books.

"Mr. POWERS. I certainly will not." (March 28, 1940, record, pp. 54–55.)

"Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Powers, were you old enough to remember your father before he left Russia?

"Mr. POWERS. I consider that to be a personal question, and I will not answer any personal questions.

"Mr. LYNCH. You refuse to answer it?

"Mr. POWERS. I refuse to answer any personal questions.

"Mr. LYNCH. Do you refuse to answer that question?

"Mr. POWERS. This committee has no right to go into any personal questions.

"Mr. LYNCH. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that he be directed to answer it.

"The CHAIRMAN. You refuse to answer the question; is that correct?

"Mr. POWERS. I do. I don't see that this committee has any right to go into personal questions." (March 28, 1940, record, p. 65.)

"Mr. LYNCH. What name did you use before you arrived in this country?

"Mr. POWERS. That is immaterial.

"Mr. LYNCH. I submit it is very material.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs you to answer that question. Do you decline to do so?

"Mr. POWERS. I consider that immaterial to this committee.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you decline to answer the question?

"Mr. POWERS. Yes." (March 28, 1940, record, p. 66.)

"Mr. LYNCH. Did your two brothers accompany you when you entered this country?

"Mr. POWERS. That is a personal question. I will not answer it.

"Mr. LYNCH. I will ask the Chair to direct him to answer it.

"The CHAIRMAN. You are directed to answer. Do you refuse to do so?

"Mr. POWERS. On the same ground." (March 28, 1940, record, p. 66.)

Because of the foregoing, the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities has been deprived of the testimony of said George Powers relative to the subject matter which, under House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities was instructed to investigate; and the willful and deliberate refusal of the witness to testify further, as hereinbefore set forth, is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared and testified; and his willful refusal to testify further without having been first excused as a witness deprives the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities of necessary and pertinent testimony, and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 452

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities as to the willful and deliberate refusal of George Powers to testify before the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to the end that the said George Powers may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill to amend the National Labor Relations Act. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with, impede, or diminish in any way the right of the several States to regulate employer-employee relations, and this act shall not be applicable in any State in which State legislation is in effect which provides for the enforcement of the right of self-organization and collective bargaining and the regulation of the conduct of parties in relation to self-organization and collective bargaining."

Throughout the country there is an increased demand for some changes either in the personnel of the National Labor Relations Board, or amendments to the act, or both.

My bill is simple, easily understood, and hits straight to one of the most vital and certainly fundamental parts of this entire labor controversy, namely, the question of States' rights.

That Congress has the power to enact such legislation is established in the case of Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Port of Philadelphia (12 How. (U. S.) 299, 13 L. Ed. 996). For precedents see act of Congress of August 8, 1890 (Wilson Act), and act of Congress of June 3, 1864, as amended February 10, 1868 (local taxation of national banks).

There is no question, and authorities have agreed that this is a field in which the Congress of the United States and the States have concurrent jurisdiction, and that State legislation is valid except as the Congress by legislation has clearly evidenced in its intent to occupy the same part of the field. No one will argue, of course, that in the latter event laws that are passed down here—in other words, Federal law—is paramount.

And it is agreed and has been demonstrated that in the case of administrative conflict the local law must give way, and consequently States' rights again subjected to the authority of the Federal Government. This occurs regardless of how much better adapted may be local administration to Federal administration.

The point I want to make right here is that only by congressional action is the power of the States in this particular field of labor relations restricted, and my amendment would merely restore to the States the concurrent power which they had before the Wagner Act became law.

I am not arguing the constitutionality of the Wagner Act, because that has already been established. The fact remains, however, that employer-employee relationship is essentially local in every important aspect; and if we ever expect to again have a normal relationship between employer and employee under the law, we should, where possible, return authority to local government. Where local authorities have been indifferent to this tremendous problem, there certainly is some justification for congressional action.

However, since such States as Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Pennsylvania, Utah, and Wisconsin have disposed of this problem in a manner satisfactory to their people, why should Congress presume to interfere? Why is it not proper and sensible to give full effect to the local legislation? Certainly in this particular instance those who are directly involved have a greater interest in the problem than the country at large. Again I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Members of the House, that it is simply the old question of States' rights.

It has been argued by those interested in building up a tremendous bureaucracy here in Washington that the several State laws are inferior to the Wagner Act. Even though this be true, no significance should attach to that statement unless we intend to absolutely abolish State jurisdiction in all fields and substitute a single body of Federal law.

Certainly the proof that Federal jurisdiction is so far superior rests with those who make these broad claims for the Wagner Act. And to prove my point I refer you to the disclosures of the Smith committee and their recommendations for amendments of the Federal law. No man who has studied the report of the Smith committee can justify any claim that the National Labor Relations Board has done a better job than the local boards in the States I have before mentioned.

There is not only a duplication of administrative expense, which is unnecessary and unfortunate, but the National Board, relieved of much of its burden, would have time to clean out its own house and substitute desirable employees for those undesirables which are now on its pay roll.

Thus, with a smaller, more competent force, working on a simpler problem, the National Labor Relations Board would have a chance to fight its way back to respectability. It would have an opportunity to come to Congress with a smaller budget, because the adoption of my amendment would do away with duplication of administrative expenses, which are unnecessary and unfortunate.

There is nothing in my amendment of a partisan nature, and certainly no argument that will hold water, if true recognition of the rights of the several States is given to this particular problem. I do not intend to go into a long discourse on States' rights at this time, although I am convinced that it is high time Members of Congress got back to fundamentals in government. We all know that our National Government could not exist except that it is the creature of the several States. This usurpation of power and this concentration of government has got to stop sometime, if we are to maintain a republican form of government. And I believe that the adoption of my amendment would be one of the first steps back to the kind of government we all respected and under which we all profited.

It can be argued, of course, that State law cannot take care of the great national companies operating in several States. This argument, however, assumes that the entire national company is a proper bargaining unit. I cannot agree that this is the case. My answer to that argument is just this: That recognizing such a large national unit disfranchises the employees in a small plant who may be in complete disagreement with the company's employees elsewhere.

Suppose a company has six plants, the three largest of which have C. I. O. minded employees. Why should employees in a plant in another State a thousand miles away be denied their choice of affiliation with the A. F. of L. or to have an independent union of their own, simply because these other employees in far-distant cities whom they have never seen and with whom they have absolutely no contact, want the C. I. O.?

Again, we reach one of the most fundamental issues in the entire labor field; that is, that employees should have whatever kind of labor organization they want, small or large, and they should be absolutely free to make their own choice. A State board can afford and does afford them this opportunity. If they voluntarily choose, these employees in the smaller plants, to cooperate with the employees in the larger plants in other States, administration by a State board could not prevent it. And there is nothing in the several State laws that does prevent it or even attempts to prevent it.

It has been definitely proven that the only ones opposed to an amendment such as I have just introduced are those who want to impose the will of the Federal Government, through the National Labor Relations Board, on employers, employees, and other people everywhere, regardless of how well a State may be attending to its own problems and regardless of how satisfactory the relationship among all the people in that State might be.

It is not, in my opinion, the will of the employer or the will of the employee that is going to eventually correct this situation, but it is going to be the combined force of public opinion that is going to take us back to a recognition of States' rights and take us back again to local self-government and break up this terrible bureaucracy here in Washington.

Public opinion is showing itself today, and politicians all over the country are beginning to realize that following the will of pressure groups has been the wrong thing to do, and they are again listening to the voice of the public, that voice of all of the people.

The American public has given Federal bureaucracy a fair trial, they have permitted during the past 12 years this centralization because a number of years ago politicians sold them on the idea that it might work. This centralization was not started by the New Deal, and the Republican Party cannot disavow any responsibility for its growth; and for that reason this is not a partisan issue. This is an issue of States' rights, of fundamental American government, and I hope it will be recognized as such by this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the committee which will receive this amendment for consideration will give it their most serious attention.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a memorandum copy prepared by me of records of the General Accounting Office showing certain trips and some investigations of the travel of seven certain officials and employees of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and Federal Savings and Loan Corporation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks this afternoon let me emphasize the fact that we are giving altogether too much attention to foreign affairs and all too little attention to our problems right here at home. It is quite apparent that the present administration has seized upon the unsettled world affairs and the unfortunate wars abroad to divert the people's attention from the unsettled economic conditions in our own country and the complete failure of the administration to solve our most fundamental economic and social problems.

There are something like 10,000,000 unemployed in the United States. It seems to me that if we wish to make a real contribution to the cause of democracy, we will first set ourselves to the task of providing jobs for these unemployed. It can be done by lifting the heavy hand of government bureaucracy and taxes that are today restraining our economic machinery from going forward.

Our entire tax structure needs revision. But there is not the slightest prospect that this will be done at this session. Both the American Federation of Labor and business have pointed out the need for early revision of the National Labor Relations Act. That remains to be done. The House Judiciary Committee has pointed out the need for enacting legislation that the "governors may be governed and the regulators regulated" and reported the Walter-Logan bill. It has yet to be called up by the majority leaders. It would not be inaccurate to say that practically the only thing the administration has asked Congress to pass at this session so far are appropriation bills. The most that can be said for the administration program at this session is this: Spend money and talk about foreign wars.

Let us give some consideration to the problems and needs here at home. I desire to call your attention to a matter that needs immediate consideration and action by this House. This is only one of many such matters.

Mr. Speaker, I have addressed this House on three previous occasions with regard to the activities of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. I have spoken of the need for a complete investigation of the activities of the officials of these agencies and a complete independent audit of their accounts.

On August 2, 1939, I introduced a resolution, House Resolution 292, to authorize the Speaker to appoint a special committee of this House to conduct such an investigation and audit. It is still pending wtih the Committee on Rules, in spite of the fact that I have already presented abundant evidence of irregularities, waste, illegal actions, and gross mismanagement on the part of the officials of these agencies. At the time I introduced the resolution I explained to the House how politics and mismanagement in the New York area of the H. O. L. C. itself will result in a loss of millions of dollars.

At a subsequent date I intend to present additional evidence of faulty management and irregularities in connection with the H. O. L. C. loans and foreclosures. For the present, in order that we may not become lost in a confusion of details, I wish to direct attention to only one item of administrative expense.

I do not believe the Members of this House realize that the people we represent, whose money we appropriate, are paying for fishing trips, summer vacations, visits to relatives and friends, and expenses to football games for officials of these three agencies. I do not believe the Members of this House realize that our people are paying for sun baths in Florida and California, attendance at Rose Bowl football games, week-end boat trips, and cross-country sightseeing, tours for officials of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. Our people are even paying transportation expenses of the officials of these agencies in order that they may devote time at home on purely personal business matters, notwithstanding the fact that the law requires Government officials to devote all their time to the work of the office to which they are appointed.

Let us look at the facts. Mr. Speaker, I am not relying upon rumor, hearsay, or conjecture. I am relying upon official records. I am relying upon the best evidence obtainable—the record of the Committee on Appropriations in its hearings on the independent offices appropriation bill for 1941 and the official records of the General Accounting Office.

If you will turn to page 1148, in part 2, of the committee hearings, you will note that in 1939 the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation spent $13,726 in travel. It is the largest single item, with the exception of salaries, in the ordinary administrative expense. They even asked for an increase in 1941 to $20,000 for travel.

If you will now turn to page 1164, in part 2, of the same hearings, you will note that in 1939 the Home Owners' Loan Corporation spent $1,478,562 for travel. With the exception of salaries and personal services, this was the largest single item in the entire administrative budget.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, these three agencies annually spend something like $1,500,000 for travel alone. Nor can we be certain that it is not twice or three times that sum. They have a very neat way of keeping the Congress and the people from knowing how and where they spend money, simply by shifting expenditures which should be in the "administrative expense" category to the "nonadministrative expense" category.

In that connection let me call your attention to a paragraph of a letter addressed to me under date of May 29, 1939, by Comptroller General Fred H. Brown, in response to my inquiry concerning the expenditures of these three agencies. You will find the entire letter on pages 7510–7511, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 19, 1939, volume 84, part 7, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session. Comptroller Brown said in part:

> Using as an example an agency to which the provisions, supra, apply, in many instances there is very little distinction between "administrative expenditures" and "nonadministrative expenditures," with the result that, if the agency so desires, expenditures may be switched from the administrative to the nonadministrative category, either to prevent audit by this Office or to conserve funds limited in amount for administrative purposes, and this Office would be without means of detecting the practice without having access to expenditures under both classes.

The Comptroller General has endeavored to make such an examination of the accounts of the Federal Home Loan Bank

Board, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, but the officials of these agencies have opposed it. And so we do not really know to what extent nonadministrative funds have been used for administrative purposes. But we do know, as a fact, that these three agencies at least report an annual expenditure of around $1,500,000 for transportation purposes alone. That figure in itself indicates that the officials of these agencies are under the impression that they are presiding over a "travel bureau" and conducting a "see America first campaign."

The point I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, is that the high officials of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are having the Government pay for pleasure and personal business trips. As I stated at the outset of my remarks, we are allowing these officials to take sun baths in Florida and California, and attend football games, at the expense of the people you and I represent.

Let us again look at the facts. I have here an exact copy of the official records to be found in the General Accounting Office concerning the week-end, holiday, pleasure, and personal business trips charged to the Government. I might say that I wrote the General Accounting Office no less than three times in an effort to get this information, but without success. The only way I got this information is by having a copy of the records made myself. I understand that as long ago as February 8, the Comptroller General submitted this same information to both the Administrator of the Federal Loan Agency and the Attorney General. It appears that he has asked them for a report, but, insofar as I have been able to determine, the Comptroller General has not received it. Apparently Mr. Jesse Jones, Administrator of the Federal Loan Agency, was startled when he received the results of the Comptroller General's investigation—so startled that he does not quite know how to reply. Prior to the reorganization, he had no jurisdiction over the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and these two corporations.

On June 19, 1939, I brought to your attention the illegal travel of Mr. Nugent Fallon, general manager of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. At that time I presented conclusive evidence to show that he was using Government funds to travel to and from his home for his own personal pleasure and personal business. I stated at the time that he did the same thing when he was with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I now present to you all the facts, in addition to what I have already presented.

The records of the General Accounting Office show that Mr. Nugent Fallon, as deputy general manager of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation prior to December 1, 1935, at a salary of $10,000 per year, illegally spent $1,510.50 for week-end trips and holiday trips to his home in New York City and his summer home at Swampscott, Mass., a suburb of Boston.

The records also show that he spent $1,881.68 for the same purpose as general manager of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. In other words, Mr. Nugent Fallon has charged the Government $3,392.18 for transportation and per diem allowance in order that he could run back and forth over week ends to New York and Boston.

When I pointed out some of these facts on the floor last June, Mr. Fallon offered the explanation that the contact work of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation necessitated week-end trips to the New York and Boston area, in order to give encouragement to the Government's insurance program. Now, I wonder what explanation Mr. Fallon has to offer for the week-end trips to the same cities before he became general manager of the Insurance Corporation and was associated with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I weigh my words when I say that Mr. Fallon has been conducting a deliberate fraud on this Congress and on the people we represent. We not only should stop paying for his week-end visits home, but indeed we should stop paying his $10,000 a year salary. Any man who would attempt to deceive the Congress and the people in the matter of transportation expense is certainly not the type of man to be trusted with the millions of dollars handled by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I have asked and obtained unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the exact copy of the records at the General Accounting Office showing the week-end trips of Mr. Fallon and the findings of that Office in its investigation.

[1] Paid in cash. [2] These vouchers have been previously reported. Reported again to show the lack of justification of the so-called official business. [3] Auto.

Note 1. Voucher No. 188486, October 12–19, 1934

This was first apparently a week-end trip to New York. From New York Mr. Fallon proceeded to Boston, Mass., where he secured his car and returned to Washington. Mr. Fallon has a summer home at Swampscott, Mass., a short distance from Boston, and it appears that the trip was the means whereby his car was brought to Washington for use through the winter.

Note 2. Voucher No. 367821, June 25–July 8, 1935

Mr. Fallon left Washington, D. C., at 4:50 a. m., June 25, in his personally owned automobile and arrived at 11:30 p. m. of the same day in Swampscott, Mass., and the voucher indicates that he was on duty June 26. Mr. Fallon failed to show the date and time of departure from Swampscott, but does show that he arrived in Boston at 8:30 a. m., June 27, and left there at 3 p. m. of the same day, destination, date, and time of arrival not stated. Mr. Fallon shows himself as being on annual leave June 28 to July 3, inclusive, and on duty in Boston July 5 to 7, inclusive, which latter period was a week end. He left Boston at 8 p. m., July 7, and arrived in Washington July 8, 1935. Mr. Fallon's trip appears to have been not only for the purpose of a vacation in and around Boston but also for the purpose of getting his car to Swampscott for use at his summer home. Mr. Tilton, assistant to Mr. Fallon, accompanied him on this trip, both returning to Washington by train.

Note 3. Voucher No. 417557, September 26–29, 1935

This trip appears to have been for the personal convenience of Mr. Fallon. (Attention is invited to voucher No. 367821, dated June 25 to July 8, 1935, wherein it is stated that Mr. Fallon drove his personally owned automobile to Swampscott, apparently for family use during the summer.) Upon arrival in Swampscott, Mr. Fallon took annual leave from midnight September 27 to midnight September 28. He left Boston for Washington, D. C., at 4:40 a. m., September 29, in his car, together with Mr. Tilton, who accompanied him north in the spring. This also happened to be a week-end trip, and there follows a summary of the cost thereof, including the cost of transporting the car to Washington, D. C.:

	Salary	Travel	Per diem	Total
Mr. Fallon, 4 days	$93.36	$20.47	$11.25	$125.08
Mr. Tilton, 4 days	88.88	21.78	16.25	126.91
Total	182.24	42.25	27.50	251.99

Note 4. Voucher No. 324, December 11–15, 1935

This was a week-end trip to New York and Asbury Park, N. J.

Note 5. Voucher No. 340, December 22–25, 1935

This trip to New York extended from Sunday until Christmas, and was made apparently to take advantage of the holidays.

Note 6. Voucher No. 359, January 15–16, 1936

This was a 2-day trip to New York apparently in connection with savings and loan association matters.

Note 7. Voucher No. 373, January 21–26, 1936

This trip from Washington, D. C., to Miami, Fla., and return, began at 7:30 a. m., January 21, 1936. Part of the trip was by automobile, part by train, and part by airplane, and while no attempt is made to list the various stop-overs on this trip, Dr. Emery Woodall, Associate General Counsel of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, commented thereon as follows:

"NOTE.—To Miami, Fla., January 21, 1936, to January 26, 1936, via Richmond, Va.; Durham, N. C.; Winston-Salem, N. C.; Charlotte, N. C.; Columbia, S. C.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Miami, Fla.; Savannah, Ga.; Columbia, S. C.; Raleigh, N. C.; Washington, D. C.

"* * * Mr. Horace Russell, General Counsel, instructed me to travel with Mr. Fallon to Miami, Fla. At Mr. Fallon's request, I drove my car as far south as Columbia, S. C. I was not informed by the General Counsel what my duties would be other than to assist Mr. Fallon as he might request in any conferences he might have. It was Mr. Fallon's first trip to Miami. On the way to Miami and on the return trip only the following official business was transacted:

"1. A 15-minute conversation with Mr. M. H. Bristow, commissioner of insurance and banking, at his office in Richmond. I transacted no official business in Miami. We did, however, see Miami from Hialeah Park to Miami Beach bathing. The weather was cold, however, so that our stay was short. I had previously known Mr. Bristow in connection with the reorganization resulting in the establishment of the Norfolk Federal Savings and Loan Association. I introduced Mr. Fallon to Mr. Bristow. The conference had no particular purpose.

"At Durham, N. C., we drove through the grounds of Duke University and admired the beauty of the new buildings of that university.

"2. We spent one night and the next morning in Winston-Salem, N. C., and visited with the president and some of the officers of the Federal Home Loan Bank of Winston-Salem. It constituted a getting-acquainted conference for Mr. Fallon.

"Our route carried us through Charlotte, N. C. I don't believe we even stopped to say 'hello' to the officers of a Federal association, although Mr. Fallon suggested that we might do that. He had inquired from Mr. LaRoque the name of some of the associations and their officers whom he might drop in on.

"3. A short conference with Mr. Thomas H. Daniel, chief examiner of the banking department of South Carolina. The conference occurred late in the evening in the lobby of one of the hotels in Columbia, S. C. Our schedule permitted only a few hours there, most of which was consumed in a leisurely dinner. Mr. Daniel joined us after dinner. Upon arrival at Jacksonville, Fla., a field representative of the Board, Mr. Robert K. Bruhn, met us with his car and drove us to Miami. This was the first illustration I had seen of using a field representative as chauffeur and the Government mileage compensation to provide a private car for cross-country touring. Mr. Bruhn had come from Alabama so as to provide his car with himself as driver. We transacted no official business in Jacksonville other than meeting Mr. Bruhn and getting into his car.

"4. While in Miami, Mr. Fallon and Mr. Bruhn called on one of the Federal savings and loan associations, spending only a short time at their office. Mr. Bruhn informed me that the conversation was general—regarding building conditions in Miami. Mr. Fallon had only recently taken his position; he had had no previous knowledge of or experience in building and loan affairs; he was not in charge of any supervisory activities. Supervision of insured institutions is handled by the Governor's office. The call upon the association had no bona fide objective. He did not permit me to accompany him on such visit to the association lest, he said, they be frightened by the appearance of a lawyer.

"The plane which we used from Miami landed us in Savannah, Ga., after midnight. We transacted no official business in Savannah other than to board a Pullman for Columbia, S. C. We transacted no official business in Columbia, S. C., on the return trip other than to get my car which I had left in the care of a boyhood friend who lived there.

"5. By long-distance telephone Mr. O. K. LaRoque, president of the Federal Home Loan Bank of Winston-Salem, N. C., was requested to meet us in Raleigh, N. C., at lunch on the Sunday following our departure from Miami by airplane Saturday night. Mr. Fallon had determined to be back in the office Monday morning. He stated that we should contact for record purposes at least one other State building and loan supervisor. He had requested Mr. LaRoque to arrange for the insurance commissioner of North Carolina, Mr. Dan C. Boney, to meet Mr. Fallon at the Sir Walter Raleigh Hotel in Raleigh for a short conference on Sunday afternoon. Mr. LaRoque had worked under Mr. Boney as supervisor of building and loan associations immediately preceding his becoming president of the Federal Home Loan Bank of Winston-Salem. The conference was very general.

"Upon our return I was quite disgusted with the junket, because I was bound to conclude that I had been forced to be a party to a private trip at public expense. I reported my conclusions to the general counsel, Mr. Horace Russell."

Below is a copy of a telegram Mr. Fallon sent to his secretary:

MIAMI BEACH, FLA., January 23, 1936.

MISS HARRIET ROACH,
Room 7520, New Post Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Working here Friday. Two bad situations. Leaving Bruhn here. Saturday at Raleigh with LaRoque. Send message through him. Post me if anything important.

NUGENT FALLON,
General Manager.

In the above telegram Mr. Fallon referred to two bad situations in Miami, but Dr. Woodall mentioned in his remarks that they visited only one institution, and that for only a few minutes, and that Mr. Bruhn intimated to him that the conversation was general in regard to building conditions in and around Miami. Mr. Fallon also mentioned leaving Mr. Bruhn in Miami. However, Mr. Bruhn's territory was in the vicinity of Alabama, and there would appear to be no necessity for him to accompany Mr. Fallon back to Washington, D. C. Mr. Fallon's statement of travel shows that he arrived in Washington, D. C., at 1 a. m. Sunday, January 26, 1936, but the telegram indicated that he would be in Raleigh, N. C., on Saturday, January 25, and Dr. Woodall's statement shows that he, Mr. Fallon, and Mr. LaRoque, the commissioner of banking in North Carolina, had a luncheon engagement in Raleigh on Sunday, January 26, followed by a short general conversation in the afternoon, arriving in Washington apparently on Monday morning, January 27, 1936, which indicates a discrepancy between the statement on the voucher and that made by Dr. Woodall.

Note 8. Voucher No. 525, June 17–29, 1936

Dr. Woodall made the following statement in connection with this trip:

"On June 16 Mr. Russell, general counsel, requested me to prepare to go to Harrisburg, Pa., with Mr. Fallon the next day. I immediately contacted Mr. Fallon, and he informed me that he was driving to Boston so as to take his car to Swampscott for the summer, where his family was located for the summer. Chairman Fahey also has a summer home in Swampscott. He said he had arranged to call on the building and loan supervisor in Harrisburg, Pa., en route to Plattsburg, N. Y., where he planned to make a speech. He stated he was leaving very early the next morning. He suggested that perhaps Mrs. Woodall would like to ride with us to Harrisburg and spend the day with me there.

"We left Washington quite early in the morning and had a conference with Mr. Eshbach, building and loan supervisor of Pennsylvania, regarding possible methods of reorganization by Pennsylvania building and loan associations for the purpose of obtaining insurance of their accounts by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. Mr. Fallon had requested that Mr. Robert A. Cunningham, counsel for the Federal Home Loan Bank of Pittsburgh, meet us in Harrisburg. I discussed with Mr. Cunningham the case of our Home Building and Loan Association of Philadelphia, Pa. This discussion occurred after Mr. Fallon had proceeded by automobile northward. I also discussed with Mr. Cunningham revisions of the illustrative forms of shares to be issued by insured institutions in Pennsylvania. Mr. Fallon sat in on the conference with Mr. Eshbach, which was very brief, and proceeded to Plattsburg. The matters being discussed were matters of reorganization law. Mr. Fallon made no contribution to the discussion."

Dr. Woodall made the following comment in connection with this trip:

"In his justification to the Board, page 9 of his memorandum dated July 19, 1939, Mr. Fallon refers to a meeting with the deputy commissioner of banking of New Jersey and with others at Newark, N. J. He mentions that I was present at that meeting. Although there had been several weeks of conferences between Mr. Bliss, president of the Federal Home Loan Bank of New York, and the New Jersey authorities, the conference that day in Newark was the first meeting for some time. My travel voucher covering my trip to Newark and return on November 12 shows that the only official conference that was held was between 2:30 p. m. and 10 p. m. I arrived via Eastern Airlines in Newark at 2:20 p. m. and left Newark via Eastern Airlines at 10 p. m.

"* * * It is true that various building and loan associations were visited; the visits were pleasant, more social than official."

Note 10. Voucher No. 942, August 6–23, 1937

Below is the statement of Dr. Woodall on this trip:

"I arrived in Boston on August 9 at 7 a. m. I left Boston at 3:30 p. m. the next day. Mr. Fallon, on page 15 of his memorandum of justification to the members of the Board dated July 19, 1939, states that 'our records indicate that I was accompanied in Boston on the 6th and 7th by Associate General Counsel Woodall for the purpose of working out a legal plan for insuring State-chartered cooperative banks without the conversion of such banks to Federal charters. Under the law of Massachusetts, as then existing, a State-chartered cooperative bank could not obtain Federal insurance without conversion. Discussions were held with the authorities on prospective Massachusetts and Rhode Island legislation.'

"I was not in Boston on the 6th or the 7th. Mr. Fallon had requested me to accompany him to Boston, but I had official business which compelled me to be in Norfolk on August 7. After conference with Mr. Fallon before he left for Boston, therefore, it was arranged that I would go to Norfolk by taking the Boston boat from Baltimore, spend Saturday in Norfolk and attend to the official business which I had relating to the pending litigation against the Norfolk Federal by the receiver of the Definite Contract Building and Loan Association and arrive in Boston on Monday morning, August 9, on the Merchants and Miners' boat.

"Mr. Fallon was called to Chicago and left Boston on August 9. I discussed with the president and counsel of the Boston bank the problems affecting insurance program in Boston. Mr. Fallon's statement is inaccurate when he states that under the law of Massachusetts State-chartered cooperative banks could not obtain Federal insurance without conversion. The reason there were difficulties was that under the mutual insurance fund which the State of Massachusetts had set up by statute, State-chartered cooperative banks had unlimited liability for the losses which might be sustained by any of the other banks in the mutual insurance fund. For that reason, the board of trustees of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation refused as a matter of policy (not as a matter of law) to insure cooperative banks in Massachusetts unless they terminated their relationship with the mutual State insurance fund of Massachusetts by converting into a Federal savings and loan association. There was nothing new in the situation at the time I went to Boston. The matter was not at that time critical. As he stated, I had some conferences about the matter. Conferences regarding legislation were very general. The fact is, I wondered why I had been asked by Mr. Fallon to come to Boston. He had made certain engagements for me. I saw him only about 10 minutes on August 9. So far as I could learn he was not engaged in official business but was visiting relatives. I wound up the appointments on August 10 as early as possible and got out of town by airplane. I had sat around the Boston bank almost all day on the 9th wondering why I had been asked to come to Boston. Mr. Fallon's memorandum to me, dated August 6, 1937, requested me to meet him in the Boston bank about 9 a. m. Monday morning. A copy of that memorandum is attached. As I looked back on this trip it seemed to me that I was supposed to be in Boston for a cover for an extended stay by Mr. Fallon in that city. He was quite disappointed that he had to go to Chicago. The trip to Chicago was bona fide, but it should be noted it was only a 2-day trip."

FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION,
August 6, 1937.

MEMO

To Dr. WOODALL.
From NUGENT FALLON.

In accordance with our plan and to handle legal phases of the tax situation in Massachusetts, which is proving troublesome to converted Federals, and the legal details of insurance of nonconverted cooperative banks in Massachusetts and prospective legislation, I will very much appreciate meeting you in the Boston Bank about 9 a. m. Monday, August 9, with Mr. Neaves, who is looking for us.

N. FALLON, N. F.

Note 11. Voucher No. 1025, September 29–October 18, 1937

This trip to the Pacific coast is also referred to in note 14 in connection with travel of Mr. Webb.

Note 12. Voucher No. 1247, February 27–March 8, 1938

This appears to have been an extended trip through the South with stops at various points in connection with which it is reported substantially as follows:

Mr. Fallon traveled in his privately owned automobile from Washington to Aiken, S. C., apparently accompanied by his wife. At Aiken they were met by Mr. J. Aldrich Hall, who had driven his private automobile from Washington to Aiken (Mr. Hall's former home) and the trip was apparently continued to Apalachicola, Fla., and other points and return to Aiken in Mr. Hall's automobile, driven by Mr. Hall. Upon return to Aiken Mr. Fallon apparently obtained his automobile and completed the return trip to Washington accompanied by his wife.

Note 13. Voucher No. 1296, April 7–12, 1938

This was a trip to Asbury Park, Atlantic City, and to New York over the week end.

Note 14. Voucher No. 1297, April 15–18, 1938

This was a week-end trip during the Easter holiday. Mr. Fallon made notation on his expense voucher for this trip as follows:

"Termination of official business would have permitted traveler to leave Norfolk, Va., at 5:45 p. m., April 16, 1938, and arriving in Washington, D. C., 7 a. m., April 17, 1938; therefore per diem is claimed for that period only."

Dr. Woodall made statement in connection with this trip as follows:

"In his memorandum of justification, page 19, Mr. Fallon stated: 'This was a planned trip to determine the cause of our slow progress and to scrutinize the situation in a building and loan association which we had reorganized in cooperation with the State banking commission over a year before. Our records indicate that a merger was accomplished of the association in question. I met Dr. Woodall in Norfolk.'

"By this statement a situation is implied which it was designed would deceive the casual reader. The only possible associations to which Mr. Fallon could have had reference was either the Norfolk Federal Savings and Loan Association or the State Building Association. Both were reorganized in cooperation with the State banking commissioner; one as a Federal association, the other as a State-chartered association. Since that time the small, weak, reorganized State-chartered association has been absorbed by the Norfolk Federal Savings and Loan Association by merger. The merger was engineered by Mr. A. G. Bailey without the assistance from the Washington office, and no one in the Washington office had ever considered the matter prior to the time Mr. Bailey arranged the matter locally and put it through. In April 1938 the merger had never been dreamed of as feasible or possible and no proposition had ever been made to that effect. It is doubtful that Mr. Fallon even called on the State Building and Loan Association. He stated that he had not found the secretary in when he telephoned. Mr. Fallon did meet me in Norfolk (by accident). His statement, however, taken in connection with other statements as to occasions upon which I had accompanied him, would lead the unsuspecting person to imagine that by prearrangement I had met him in Norfolk to handle official business. In fact, I was in Norfolk over the Easter week end on annual leave with my wife, visiting Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Bailey. Mr. Bailey was, and still is, president of the Norfolk Federal Savings and Loan Association, an association organized to salvage a substantial part of the assets of the Definite Contract Building and Loan Association, which has been placed in receivership. My stay in Norfolk was wholly personal. When on Saturday Mr. Bailey received a message from Mr. Fallon that he wished to call upon him at the office of the Norfolk Federal Savings and Loan Association, I accompanied Mr. Bailey to the office. Mr. Bailey had also taken leave from business, but accommodated Mr. Fallon by meeting him at his office. Mr. Fallon turned up at Mr. Bailey's office some time after 11 o'clock in the morning. He was somewhat surprised to find me there but doubtless thought no more of it when it was explained that Mrs. Woodall and I were visiting the Baileys. I had in the past caused Mr. Fallon to be entertained by the Baileys. I was present during the conference between Mr. Fallon and Mr. Bailey. The conference was short. It consisted of certain random questions with regard to the general financial condition of various other building and loan associations in the Norfolk area, a list of which Mr. Fallon had on a sheet of paper on which appeared the names of certain building and loan associations, and a few facts about each, such as could be obtained from the annual report of the State banking department by Mr. Pfeiffer who prepared the memorandum for Mr. Fallon. Mr. Bailey had no more intimate knowledge of the financial conditions of these other associations; they did not publish their annual statements. No particular additional information was sought; the discussion was very general and centered around the hope that additional institutions would become insured. Mr. Fallon then inquired from Mr. Bailey how he could best get his bags to the Cavalier Hotel at Virginia Beach, whereupon Mr. Bailey offered to drive him down to Virginia Beach. Both Mrs. Bailey and Mrs. Woodall accompanied us and we made a pleasant trip to the beach out of the change of plan required to take Mr. Fallon to the Cavalier Hotel, where he spent the Easter week end. There was no other official business conducted so far as I was able to learn. Mr. Fallon informed me that as his family was away for the Easter vacation and it was too far to go to them, he would spend the Easter holiday at Virginia Beach.

"It was on the same day that Mr. Fallon asked Mr. Bailey to find for him a yacht which he could rent during the next summer. Mr. Bailey found such a yacht, which Mr. Fallon chartered. I understand that he dismissed the yacht at Gloucester, Mass., and has been sued by the charter party."

An article appeared in the Washington Evening Star April 18, 1939, as follows:

"YACHTING BILL PRESENTED—NUGENT FALLON VIA COURT

"Nugent Fallon of the Army-Navy Club was named defendant in a district court action late yesterday when two Suffolk, Va., businessmen presented him with a bill for $5,050, with interest at 6 percent, as the aftermath of hiring a yacht, which they contend he made unseaworthy when he turned on some valves without consulting the captain of the craft.

"District court was advised that Benjamin B. Elliott and Milton T. Elliott, of Suffolk, entered into a contract with Mr. Fallon, under which he hired the yacht Romar for $2,000. The action was filed by Attorney F. H. Marshall, of the law firm of Whiteford, Marshall, Hart & Carmody, and declared the yacht was hired from May to September of last year, but that Mr. Fallon paid $1,500 of the $2,000.

"But, they claim, because he violated the terms of the contract in which he agreed to replace or make good any damage to the craft, and tampered with some valves, he ruined the engine and made the yacht unnavigable.

"They asked district court to get their money for them and presented a bill which includes $500 due still on the charter party; traveling expenses, food, and lodging in endeavoring to repair the Romar and install new engine, $289; $614 as a marine railway charge; $50 to tow the vessel to New Bedford, Mass.; $1,500 as the cost of a new engine; $625 to install this engine; and $250 as expenses for the return of the yacht to Virginia waters—a total of $4,050, plus interest at 6 percent."

Note 15. Voucher No. 1633, December 8–10, 1938

This trip to New York was for the purpose of attending the midwinter conferences of the New York State League, which were held December 8 and 9. Below is a memorandum to Mr. Fallon found with the vouchers:

"Please destroy the certified copies of resolution adopted by the board of trustees, December 6, concerning your travel and attendance of the New York State League of Savings and Loan Associations meeting and use in lieu of the destroyed copies the attached."

A copy of the original resolution of December 6, 1938, could not be found. There appears to have been passed the following resolution to evade the direct reason of attending the meeting stated above.

"Be it resolved, That the board of trustees having determined that it is in the best interests and in furtherance of the official business of the corporation, Nugent Fallon, general manager, is authorized to travel to New York, N. Y., on official business to include attendance at the midwinter conference of the New York State League of Savings and Loan Associations and travel expenses incurred pursuant to this resolution are hereby authorized without regard to the provisions of Thirty-seventh Statutes at Large 854 (5 U. S. C. 83).

"I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of resolution adopted by the board of trustees, Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, on December 6, 1938.

"H. CAULSON,
Assistant Secretary."

There was also found in Mr. Fallon's voucher for this trip the following memorandum:

"MEMORANDUM TO ALL DEPARTMENT AND DIVISION HEADS—HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION, FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION

"The question of clearing travel vouchers with the General Accounting Office, where employees while traveling on official business attend any meeting or convention of a society, association, league, or other organization, was considered by the board yesterday and I was directed to inform you that it will hereafter be necessary, prior to such travel and attendance, for the employee to secure the approval of the board of directors or board of trustees, as the case may be, in the form of a resolution authorizing such travel, and attendance. Application for such resolution should be made to the secretary in memorandum form giving all the essential facts pertaining to the meeting or convention, such as the name of the organization holding the meeting or convention, the dates, the place where it is to be held, and whether the travel expense is to be charged to the H. O. L. C. or Insurance Corporation.

"Please inform the members of your staff accordingly.

"R. L. NAGLE,
Secretary to the Board."

Now let us turn to the case of Mr. John H. Fahey, Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. The records of the General Accounting Office show that he charged the Board itself $741.31 for transportation and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation $6,900.21, or a total of $7,641.52, for week-end trips to Boston, Mass., where he has his home, and to New York, where he has his business interests. In addition to being a trustee of the Edward A. Filene estate, Mr. Fahey is also president of the Twentieth Century Fund, with headquarters in New York City.

If you will just examine this list of trips of Mr. Fahey to New York and Boston you will legitimately conclude that he is hardly ever to be found in Washington. Any number of people having business with the Home Loan Bank Board have complained to me that they can rarely locate Mr. Fahey in Washington. It is quite understandable why millions of dollars of the people's money will be lost through faulty and irregular practices when the Chairman of the Board himself is devoting a large part of his time taking care of personal affairs, which time he should be devoting to his Government, which pays him a salary of $10,000 per year.

Mr. Fahey has been deliberately ignoring chapter 522, section 17, of the act of July 22, 1932, which reads as follows:

Each member shall devote his entire time to the business of the Board. Before entering upon his duties each of the members shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office.

Mr. Speaker, I have asked and obtained unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the copy of the records of the General Accounting Office and the findings in its investigation of the travel of Mr. Fahey at the expense of the Government.

Note 1. Voucher 2006, June 8–12, 1934

The voucher shows Mr. Fahey to have been in Boston on official business. However, your attention is invited to the copies of two telegrams quoted below:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1934.

ALBERT M. CREIGHTON,
50 Congress Street, Boston, Mass.:

Unless some urgent development this afternoon prevents, I hope to reach Littles Point tomorrow forenoon and will be glad to join you in the afternoon.

JOHN H. FAHEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1934.

Hon. JOHN H. FAHEY,
Littles Point, Swampscott, Mass.:

No meeting of emergency council tomorrow. Mr. Russell knows of no calls from committees of Congress necessitating your presence.

ELIZABETH D. GLOVER.

The telegrams indicate that Mr. Fahey spent the week end at his summer home in Swampscott, Mass., instead of being in Boston on official business.

Note 2. Voucher No. 181073, September 19–26, 1934

Mr. Fahey returned from Boston on September 18 and left the next day for Boston, where he was on duty from September 20 to September 25. Attention is invited to the following statement showing the number of trips to Boston and days away from his headquarters from June to September:

	Days
June 8 to June 12	3
June 28 to July 10	10¾
July 20 to Aug. 7	17¾
Aug. 16 to Aug. 21	5¾
Aug. 23 to Sept. 4	12
Sept. 6 to Sept. 18	11¾
Sept. 19 to Sept. 26	6¾

This indicates that Mr. Fahey was away from his headquarters in Washington approximately 68 days during the period, of which 10 days represent annual leave taken. It is understood that Mr. Fahey is trustee of an estate in Boston and that he has a summer home at Swampscott, Mass.

Note 3. Voucher No. 43776, July 31–September 29, 1936

Mr. Fahey left Washington on the week end for Boston, where he remained from August 1 to August 5 on official business. He made a trip to New York on official business August 6 and 7, returning to Boston August 7. He took annual leave from August 8 to September 14, returning to official duty in Boston on September 15, and made another trip to New York for the period September 16, 17, and 18, leaving New York September 18 and arriving in Boston the same day, where he remained until September 25. Mr. Fahey was on annual leave September 26 to 28, inclusive, and returned to duty in Boston September 29, returning to Washington the same day. In addition to being a trustee of the estate of the late Edward A. Filene, Mr. Fahey is also president of the Twentieth Century Fund, headquarters, New York City, which was founded in 1919 and endowed by the late Edward A. Filene.

Note 4. Voucher No. 87204, October 14–November 14, 1937

This trip to the Pacific coast extended over a period of 32 days, of which Mr. Fahey spent 14 days in Los Angeles (at which time Mr. Webb was also in Los Angeles), 5 days in San Francisco, 3 days in Portland, Oreg., 3 days in Seattle, Wash., and 3 days in Chicago. The records of the Pullman Co. show that two people occupied Mr. Fahey's compartment from Seattle to Chicago.

To summarize, the records indicate that Mr. Fahey was absent from his office 181¾ days (approximately 6 months) during the year 1937, and during that year received the following amounts:

Traveling expense	$1,195.08
Subsistence	1,023.50
Salary	10,000.00
Total	12,218.58

Note 5. Voucher No. 58491, January 23–26, 1939

Mr. Fahey was accompanied on this trip by Mr. Hancock, a member of the Board. Mr. Fahey submitted a bill for per diem of $13.75; however, the records of the home loan bank at Winston-Salem, N. C., a Government-controlled corporation, show an expense item of $7.90 paid to the Robert E. Lee Hotel for a room occupied by Mr. John Fahey while in Winston-Salem. It thus appears that Mr. Fahey was reimbursed from two different sources, resulting in travel allowances contrary to law.

Now, let us turn to the trips at Government expense of Mr. T. D. Webb, Vice Chairman of the Board, whose home is in Nashville, Tenn. He has a son, T. D. Webb, Jr., located in Cincinnati, Ohio, an employee of the Board. It is an interesting fact, indeed, that whereas Mr. Fahey travels to New York and Boston, allegedly on Government business, Mr. Webb travels to Nashville, Tenn., and Cincinnati, Ohio, allegedly on Government business.

The records of the General Accounting Office show, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. T. D. Webb spend $3,404.29 on such trips as week ends in Nashville, Cincinnati, and to Atlantic City, N. J. In fact, the records show that Mr. Webb was a frequent visitor to Atlantic City.

Note 1. Vouchers Nos. 83 and 90, June 30–July 6

Mr. Webb's home was originally in Nashville, Tenn., and this trip was made over the week end and July 4, the holiday.

Note 2. Voucher 125, September 1–7, 1933

This trip to Nashville, Tenn, by way of Cincinnati, Ohio, was made over the week end and Labor Day.

Note 3. Voucher No. 00728, November 9–14, 1933

On this trip to Nashville, Tenn., Springfield, and Cincinnati, Ohio, Mr. Webb arranged to be in Nashville, his former home, over the week end. The voucher shows that Mr. Webb left Nashville in his privately owned automobile on November 14, but date and time of arrival in Washington, D. C., are not shown nor was there any charge after the 14th for travel expense or transportation

Note 4. Voucher No. 122827, June 30–July 9, 1934

Mr. Webb left Washington, D. C., June 30, and arrived in Nashville, Tenn., July 1, where he was on annual leave from July 1 to July 6, inclusive. He left Nashville July 7 for Washington by way of Cincinnati, Ohio, where he stopped over 1 day and arrived in Washington July 9. It would appear that this was a vacation trip made by Mr. Webb as it will be noted that he went on annual leave immediately upon his arrival in Nashville, his former home.

Note 5. Voucher No. 227372, November 14–19, 1934

On this week-end trip, Mr. Webb was accompanied by his wife and daughter, from Nashville, Tenn., to Washington. The voucher shows Mr. Webb on duty in Nashville November 16 and 17 (Friday and Saturday), leaving Nashville Sunday, November 18. On the return trip Mrs. Webb could not locate the Pullman tickets, whereupon Mr. Webb issued two Government-transportation requests for berths for his wife and daughter, which procedure was not only contrary to law but also contrary to the penalty provision appearing on the face of all Government-transportation requests.

Note 6. Voucher No. 397187, August 16–20, 1935

This was a week-end trip to Boston and Swampscott, Mass., at which time Mr. Webb, accompanied by Mrs. Webb, visited the home of Mr. Fahey at Swampscott, and the following telegrams were located in the files relating to the trip.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 14, 1935.

Mr. and Mrs. JOHN H. FAHEY,
Littles Point, Swampscott, Mass.:

Have decided if entirely agreeable to you to leave here Friday night and Mrs. Webb will be with me provided this is convenient to Mrs. Fahey.

T. D. WEBB.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 16, 1935.

Mr. and Mrs. JOHN H. FAHEY,
Littles Point, Swampscott, Mass.:

Mrs. Webb arriving here from Nashville 11:30 this morning. We are leaving tonight on the Federal for Boston. Will see you Saturday morning Copley-Plaza.

T. D. WEBB.

Note 7. Voucher No. 5709, May 2–3, 1936

This was a week-end trip to Atlantic City and it appears that Mr. Webb had someone with him as he issued a transportation request for the person, the amount of which was later reimbursed by Mr. Webb.

Note 8. Voucher No. 5713, May 20–25, 1936

This was a week-end trip to Nashville, Tenn., and Cincinnati, Ohio, Mr. Webb being accompanied by another person on the trip from Nashville to Cincinnati, and from Cincinnati to Washington, D. C., Government transportation requests being issued for travel of the other person, the cost of which was later reimbursed by Mr. Webb.

Note 9. Voucher No. 40932, June 11–13, 1936

Mr. Webb was apparently accompanied by another person on this trip as he issued transportation requests and later deducted the amounts thereof from his expense voucher.

Note 10. Voucher No. 10190, July 3–6, 1936

This trip was over the week end and July 4. On the return from New York Mr. Webb issued transportation requests for two Pullman seats and later sent his personal check in reimbursement therefor.

Note 11. Voucher No. 37591, August 7–9, 1936

This was a week-end trip to Philadelphia, Pa. From Philadelphia Mr. Webb motored to Atlantic City, N. J., and return. Transportation requests were issued by Mr. Webb for the use of a person traveling with him, the cost thereof later being deducted from the expense voucher of Mr. Webb.

Note 12. Voucher No. 91446, October 29 to November 10, 1936

Mr. Webb was accompanied by another person on this trip to Atlantic City, for whom he issued transportation requests. Two week ends were spent in Atlantic City, October 29 to 31, inclusive, and November 7 and 8. Mr. Webb went to Philadelphia where he remained November 3 and 4, returning to Atlantic City from November 5 to 8, inclusive. From Atlantic City he went to New York where he remained one day and returned to Washington, D. C., on November 10. It appears that the second person remained with Mr. Webb on this entire trip, as he reimbursed the Government for one-half of cost of transportation.

Note 13. Voucher No. 106028, May 11, 1937

This was a round trip to Harrisburg, Pa., by way of Frederick, Md., and the battlefields of Gettysburg and return to Washington, D. C., on same date in a privately owned automobile.

Note 14. Voucher No. 128509, June 17–22, 1937

This was a week-end trip with Mrs. Webb to Norfolk, Va., and return by boat. Only one stateroom was used which was covered by Government transportation request.

Note 15. Voucher No. 41153, October 7–November 9, 1937

This was a trip to Los Angeles, Calif., up the coast to Vancouver, British Columbia, and return to Washington, D. C., by the northern route. Mr. Webb took 1 day's annual leave upon his arrival in Los Angeles and then reported on duty from October 12 to 24, inclusive. He then left for San Francisco in the private automobile of Mr. Twohy.

Attention is invited to Mr. Fahey's trip to the coast October 14 to November 14 (schedule B, voucher No. 87204, note 4), and it will be noted that he and Mr. Webb were in Los Angeles at the same time. Mr. Webb was on duty from October 12 to 24, and Mr. Fahey from October 17 to 29. Mr. James Twohy, regional manager of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation at San Francisco, Calif., left San Francisco in his own automobile October 22, and arrived in Los Angeles October 23, left Los Angeles at 8 a. m. October 25, arriving in Monterey at 8:30 p. m. of the same day, and spent the next day, October 26, in and around Monterey. Mr. Twohy and Mr. Webb left Monterey October 27 at 8 a. m. and arrived in San Francisco at 5 p. m. of the same day, as to which the following notation appears on Mr. Twohy's voucher:

"This trip was made by personally owned automobile to meet Mr. T. D. Webb, Vice Chairman, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and drive him back to this [San Francisco] regional office, stopping en route to give him an opportunity to acquaint himself with this coast line and the conditions under which the Corporation operates here."

There follows a statement showing the cost of this trip to the Government.

Mr. Webb was on duty in Seattle, Wash., from October 31 to November 3, when he left for Vancouver, British Columbia, arriving there the same day, where he remained only 40 minutes and then left for Washington, D. C., arriving November 9. In addition to Mr. Fahey and Mr. Webb, Mr. Fallon was also on the coast at this time shown by his expense accounts for the period. (See schedule A, voucher No. 1025.)

Note 16. Voucher No. 86626, June 9–12, 1939

The files of the Chief Bank Examiner for the Federal Home Loan Bank Board show that Mr. Webb had his hotel expenses paid by the Federal Home Loan Bank of Chicago while there and in Milwaukee on this trip. Mr. Webb also received reimbursement for his travel expenses from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. There appears on the books of the bank, a statement substantially as follows:

The Federal Home Loan Bank, Chicago, expense account under voucher No. 7747, dated July 6, 1939, in the amount of $19.99 payable to the Hotel Schrader, Milwaukee, Wis., included the following expenses of Mr. Webb incurred June 10: Valet, $1; postage, 9 cents; room, $12; telephone, 60 cents; total, $13.69. The foregoing amount was charged on the bank's books to "other travel," the difference between $13.69 and $19.99, namely, $6.30, represented the expenses incurred by Mr. Gardner, president of the bank, on the same date. Voucher No. 7698, dated June 13, 1939, in the amount of $3.10, payable to the Blackstone Hotel, Chicago, covers the following expenses incurred by Mr. Webb on June 10, 1939: Room, $3; telephone, 10 cents. The foregoing was charged to "other travel."

The chief examiner's files contain a copy of letter from Mr. Webb to Mr. Gardner, president of the Chicago bank, dated August 8, 1939, expressing a desire to reimburse the bank for the expenses incurred. Mr. Gardner's reply, dated August 10, 1939, expressed the desire to let the matter stand unless some governmental budgetary rule was violated, inasmuch as the rooms were used for conference purposes as well as being occupied by Mr. Webb.

I now direct attention to the travel expenditures of Mr. Fred W. Catlett, another Member of the Board. His home is in Seattle, Wash., and the records of the General Accounting Office show that he charged the taxpayers no less than $5,524.69 for his pleasure excursions. It appears that "official business" took him to the Rose Bowl football game in California. When you look over his travel schedule, you will find that he transacted "Government business" on the west coast.

Note 1. Voucher No. 1352, April 14–18, 1934

Mr. Catlett took the oath of office April 5, 1934, at Seattle, Wash., and remained there until April 14 when he left for Washington, D. C. He arrived in Washington, the place of his duties and headquarters as a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, on April 18, 1934. He was reimbursed for his travel expense in addition to the payment of transportation costs from funds of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for the trip from Seattle to Washington, D. C.

Note 2. Voucher No. 3712, August 3–19, 1934

This was a trip to Seattle, Wash., where Mr. Catlett remained for 13 days, for 1 day of which he did not claim per diem, and the cost thereof was paid from funds of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. The cost of the return trip was paid from funds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Note 3. Voucher No. 3679, December 26, 1934–January 2, 1935

This was a trip by air to Los Angeles, on which Mr. Catlett was accompanied by Mr. Horace Russell, the general counsel of the Bank Board. Since the records of the Federal home-loan bank at Los Angeles show that the said bank paid for football tickets used by Mr. Catlett and Mr. Russell, it is assumed that the purpose of the trip was to attend the Rose Bowl football game.

Note 4. Voucher No. 5017, March 28–April 4, 1935

This was a trip to Jacksonville, Orlando, and Miami, Fla., during which Mr. Catlett spent 2 days in Orlando and 3 days in Miami. His voucher shows no charge for automobile transportation from Jacksonville to Orlando and Miami; however, the cost of the transportation by automobile appears to have been included in the voucher of some other official or employee.

Note 5. Voucher No. 381705, December 9–17, 1937

This was a trip to Miami, Fla., and Key West, Fla. Mr. Catlett left Miami 8:30 a. m. December 12, arrived at Key West at 10 a. m. and left Key West at 1 p. m. the same day, arriving back at Miami at 3 p. m., but no charge was made for air transportation. Mr. Catlett was in Miami 7 days.

Note 6. Voucher No. 305670, August 20–September 4, 1934

This voucher covers the return trip from Seattle, Wash., at the expense of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, by personally owned automobile to Cheyenne, Wyo., with stop-offs at Spokane, Wash., Polson, Great Falls, Livingston, Mont., and Casper, Wyo. (For trip to Seattle see F. H. L. B. voucher 3712.) At Cheyenne Mr. Catlett left his automobile and continued to Washington by train. He made notation on his voucher that no charge was made for per diem for the trip from Polson, Mont., to Great Falls, Mont., August 28; however, mileage was charged for the use of the automobile.

Note 7. Voucher No. 408796, June 10–July 24, 1935

Mr. Catlett left Washington, D. C., on June 10 and arrived in Portland, Oreg., June 13. He remained in Portland through the 15th, at which time the Pacific Northwestern Savings and Loan conferences were in session. He then left Portland by private automobile, for which there were no transportation charges, for a trip to Los Angeles, Calif., where he arrived June 20. He left June 21 for San Francisco, where he stopped 1 day; then proceeded to Seattle, Wash., and was there from June 24 to July 19, inclusive. He left Seattle July 20 and arrived in Washington, D. C., July 24. It appears that Mr. Catlett took 6 days' leave, as no charge was made for per diem from July 14 to July 19, inclusive. Attention is invited to the fact that Mr. Catlett spent 27 days in all in Seattle, Wash., his former home. Mr. Roundtree, general manager of the Federal Savings and Loan Division, was with Mr. Catlett at the conferences that were held in Coronado, Calif., and it appears that Mr. Catlett was accompanied by another person since one of his travel requests for a Pullman showed that there were two persons in the compartment from Seattle to Washington, D. C.

Note 8. Voucher No. 537197, March 19–April 12, 1936

On this trip Mr. Catlett took the southern route to Los Angeles where he remained from March 23 to March 25, inclusive, after which he left for San Francisco and Seattle, Wash. He went to Spokane for 1 day and returned to Seattle where he remained from April 1 to April 6, inclusive, then left Seattle on April 6. His expense account shows him as leaving Los Angeles April 8 for Washington, D. C., where he arrived April 12, 1936. However, attention is invited to the copies of the following telegrams:

GERBER, CALIF., April 7, 1936.

Hon. JOHN H. FAHEY,
Chairman, Federal Home Loan Bank Board,
New Post Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Call me tomorrow Federal Home Loan Bank, Los Angeles, 4:30 your time.

FRED W. CATLETT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., April 8, 1936.

Hon. JOHN H. FAHEY,
Chairman, Federal Home Loan Bank Board,
New Post Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Am compelled to change plans and leave train at Ventura for conference with Drapeau. Will proceed by automobile to Los Angeles. Better call me Hotel Biltmore, 5 o'clock, your time.

FRED W. CATLETT,
Member of the Board.

From the above two telegrams it appears there is a variance between Mr. Catlett's dates and locations on this trip. The telegram sent from San Francisco shows him as being there on April 8, while his expense voucher shows that he arrived in Los Angeles at 9 a. m. April 8, while Gerber, Calif., is not mentioned at all in his expense account.

Note 9. Voucher No. 8748, July 29–September 8, 1937

Mr. Catlett's expense voucher shows him as having arrived in Seattle, Wash., August 3, 1937, and being on official duty until August 13. No mileage was charged for a trip to Bellingham, Wash., and return to Seattle on the same day. Mr. Catlett continued on active duty through August 18, visiting Spokane for 1 day, and returning to Seattle for the period August 20 to September 1. He left Seattle in his private automobile for Washington, D. C., where he arrived September 8, 1937, after having been away from his duties at Washington for more than 40 days. He had his automobile transported to Washington at Government expense and was paid per diem for the 8 days' travel making the return trip.

Mr. Ormond E. Loomis, assistant to the Chairman of the Board, whose home is Massachusetts, on the other hand, discovered that "official business" required him to go to New York City and Boston on week ends and holidays. He charged the Government $1,542.53 for his travel and per diem allowance. There is evidence to show that he made a trip to Florida, at Government expense, for no other purpose than to recover his health.

Note 1. Voucher No. 4892, August 11–12, 1937

In the expense account of this trip the item for taxicab fare was disallowed by the auditors, and in reclaiming it Mr. Loomis wrote:

"It was raining hard and he (Mr. Loomis) had to take Mr. Hurford, president of the Los Angeles Bank, and his three heavy bags from the Vanderbilt Hotel to the Pennsylvania Hotel, where Mr. Fahey was staying."

Note 2. Voucher 47165, December 15, 1938–January 4, 1939

Mr. Loomis went to Atlanta, Ga., and upon arriving there took annual leave for 3 days, after which he left for St. Petersburg, Fla., and was on duty for 1 day and on annual leave 4 days, which included Christmas, December 25 and 26, both days being holidays. Mr. Loomis was on duty the 27th of December and left St. Petersburg for Miami, Fla., where he was on duty 2 days and annual leave 1 day. From Miami Mr. Loomis returned to Atlanta, where he again took annual leave over the New Year holidays. A statement from one of his office associates relating to the trip is as follows:

"I know of my personal knowledge that one of the assistants to the Chairman, Mr. Ormond L. Loomis, with the approval of the Chairman, made an extended trip at Government expense to Florida during the past winter for the actual purpose of recovering his health. As a justification for charging the trip to the Government, he filed a report on Federal Savings and Loan Association in Florida. I know of my own personal knowledge that such report was actually prepared in Washington, practically wholly from sources already in our files. I know that Mr. Loomis was unable, because of a serious asthmatic condition, to continue to do his work in the office at that time. He was a seriously sick person. From the things which he himself has told me I know that he did practically nothing of an official nature during his stay in Florida; that he was engaged in sun bathing and fishing. That he visited certain Federal Savings and Loan Associations there is no doubt; but he had no supervisory function to perform in connection with Federal Savings and Loan Associations; that was not the type of work in which he was engaged for the Chairman. Such work is conducted by the chief supervisor in the Governor's office. His report was not a normal activity for him. He has never made any other such report except, I believe, one in connection with Federal Savings and Loan Associations in Maine in connection with a trip to Maine, where he has a summer home. I have been informed that the General Accounting Office has also questioned the bona fide character of such a trip to Maine.

"It was common knowledge throughout the office here that the above-mentioned trip to Florida was only fictitiously public in character. More recently he went to Florida at his own expense, and there was general twittering among the senior officers here that he was not traveling this time at public expense for the ostensible purpose of writing a report on Federal Savings and Loan Associations. Even Mr. Fallon made such quips."

Note 3. Voucher No. 1509, August 31–September 13, 1938

Following is a list of building and loan associations in Maine which Mr. Loomis purports to have visited during the course of this trip:

1. Auburn: Auburn Loan & Building Association.
2. Augusta: Augusta Loan Building Association.
3. Bath: First Federal Savings & Loan Association of Bath.
4. Brunswick: Brunswick Loan & Building Association.
5. Calais: Calais Federal Savings & Loan Association.
6. Caribou: Aroostook County Federal Savings & Loan Association.
7. Ellsworth: Ellsworth Loan Building Association.
8. Lewiston: First Federal Savings & Loan Association of Lewiston.
9. Portland: Casco Loan Building Association.
10. Portland: Cumberland Loan Building Association.
11. Portland: Deering Loan & Building Association.
12. Portland: Falmouth Loan Building Association.
13. Portland: Federal Loan Building Association.
14. Portland: Homestead Loan Building Association.
15. Portland: Maine Loan Building Association.
16. Rockland: Rockland Loan Building Association.
17. Waterville: Kennebec Federal Savings & Loan Association of Waterville.
18. Waterville: Waterville Loan Building Association.
19. Waldoboro: Waldoboro Loan & Building Association.

The following itinerary should be kept in mind when studying the accompanying map. Starting from Rockland, Maine, where Mr. Loomis left the train and continued the trip in his personally owned automobile, it can readily be seen how many times his path doubles in and out of Washington, Maine, Mr. Loomis' summer home.

Left Washington, D. C., 8 p. m., August 31, 1938, arrived Boston, Mass., 7 a. m., September 1; left Boston, Mass., 11 a. m., September 1, arrived Portland, Maine, 12:50 p. m., September 1; left Portland, Maine, 11 a. m., September 2, arrived Rockland, Maine, 4:15 p. m., September 2, by train.

Left Rockland, Maine, 4:15 p. m., September 2, arrived Washington, Maine, 5 p. m., September 2; left Washington, Maine, 9 a. m., September 3, arrived Waldeboro, Maine, 9:35 a. m., September 3; left Waldeboro, Maine, 12:45 p. m., September 3, arrived Washington, Maine, 1:30 p. m., September 3. This portion of the trip was in Mr. Loomis' own automobile.

September 4 and 5, 1938, Labor Day week end, were spent in Washington, Maine, Mr. Loomis' summer home.

C., 7:10 p. m., September 13. Mr. Loomis took the train at Gardiner, Maine, for his return to Washington, D. C.

Many of the places Mr. Loomis visited have been insured since 1936, and their financial condition can be readily ascertained at any time from information in the office in Washington, D. C. The records do not disclose any application on file for insurance of any of the institutions not insured.

In connection with the list of 19 institutions which Mr. Loomis purports to have visited, representatives of this office report substantially as follows:

The Auburn Loan and Building Association at Auburn is not shown as having been visited. The Augusta Building and Loan Association at Augusta had made no application for insurance, but Mr. Loomis spent one hour and a half there. A quarter of an hour was spent at the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of Bath, which was insured in 1936 and is in good condition. There was no application on file for insurance of the Brunswick Loan and Building Association at Brunswick, but Mr. Loomis spent one-half hour there. The Calais Federal Savings and Loan Association at Calais was insured in 1936 and is in good condition. Mr. Loomis spent 3 hours there, part of which was lunch time. The Aroostook County Federal Savings and Loan Association at Caribou was insured in 1936 and is in good condition, yet one hour and a quarter was spent there, and it, too, was lunch time. The Ellsworth Building and Loan Association at Ellsworth had no application on file for insurance, and the half hour Mr. Loomis spent there was almost in the middle of the night. Two hours were spent with the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of Lewiston, which was insured in 1936 and is in good condition. Mr. Loomis was in Portland, Maine, from 1 p. m., September 1, until 11 a. m., September 2, and again from 1 p. m. to 3:30 p. m. on September 7. In that time he visited and talked business to seven building and loan associations. None of the associations visited were insured at the time, nor were there applications for insurance from any of them on file. The Rockland Loan and Building Association at Rockland had no application on file for insurance, and as Mr. Loomis arrived there by train at 4:15 p. m., September 2, and left at once in his own car, he did not have time to visit the above-listed association; nor does he show having returned to Rockland on this trip. There are two building and loan associations in Waterville, one of which was insured in 1936, and it is in good condition. The other did not have an application for insurance on file, yet Mr. Loomis spent 6 hours in Waterville. Waldoboro Loan and Building Association at Waldoboro had no application on file for insurance, yet 3 hours were passed there.

Some of the institutions visited by Mr. Loomis are not listed on his travel schedule, and some places listed on his travel schedule are not on the list of institutions visited. Examples of this are Washington, his summer home, where a great deal of time was spent, and Bangor, Houlton, and Gardiner, Maine.

Reflection on the above schedule of purported visits, with particular attention being given to the time at which the visits were made, will show that very little business of an official nature could have been transacted.

Now we come to Mr. Charles E. Tilton, Assistant General Manager of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. His home is in Manchester, N. H. It cost the Government $6,718.40 to finance his trips to New York, Boston, and New Hampshire. When you look over his travel schedule, which I am placing in the RECORD, you will naturally be inclined to believe that he spends more time going from Washington to his home and back to Washington than in carrying on any actual business.

SCHEDULE H

Note 1. Voucher No. 360962, June 25–29, 1935

It appears from Mr. Tilton's expense voucher that this trip to Boston and Swampscott, Mass., was for the purpose of accompanying Mr. Fallon, assistant general manager of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, in an automobile to his summer home at Swampscott. Attention is invited to further remarks on this trip in Mr. Fallon's voucher of the same date.

Note 2. Voucher No. 419126, September 26–29, 1935

This appears to have been a trip for the convenience of Mr. Fallon. Attention is invited to Mr. Fallon's expense account No. 417557.

Note 3. Voucher No. 7158, July 1–14, 1936

It appears that this trip to Boston was primarily for a vacation, as Mr. Tilton took leave from July 3 to July 13 which consumed practically his whole stay in that locality.

Note 4. Voucher No. 29578, September 2–15, 1936

This was a trip to New York for 1 day, then on to Boston where Mr. Tilton started his vacation on September 4 and remained there on leave until September 14, when he returned to Washington, arriving there September 15.

Note 5. Voucher No. 44930, January 5–7, 1938

This trip took Mr. Tilton to Rutland, Vt., via New York City and Albany, and return the same way. This trip took 3 days, 1 day being spent each way in New York.

Note 6

It appears from vouchers Nos. 1485, 1498, and 1504, that Mr. Tilton was on duty in New York and Boston continuously from August 19 to September 20, 1938. On voucher No. 1514 Mr. Tilton shows that he left Washington again for Boston on the same day of his arrival from that vicinity and took annual leave on September 23 and 24.

Between Mr. Fahey, Mr. Fallon, and Mr. Tilton one would certainly think the New York-Boston area was well taken care of by these officials. Are we to be so naive as to conclude that they made these week-end and frequent trips to the Atlantic coast to conduct official business and it is just a matter of coincidence that their homes and business interests are located on the Atlantic seaboard? Are we to be so naive as to conclude that it was purely a matter of coincidence that Mr. Catlett's home was in Seattle, Wash., and official business took him frequently to the State of Washington and the State of California?

Mr. James Roundtree, assistant to the Vice Chairman of the Board, has his home in Nashville, Tenn. He, of course, found reasons why he should go to Nashville frequently. On one occasion at least, as shown by the General Accounting Office records, he returned from a trip to Tulsa, Okla., via Nashville, in order that he could be home for the Thanksgiving holidays. His pleasure excursions cost the Government $2,349.10.

Note 1. Voucher No. 483, November 18–29, 1933

This was a trip to Tulsa, Okla., and return via Memphis and Nashville, Tenn., and it apparently afforded Mr. Roundtree a means of spending the Thanksgiving holidays, November 23, 24, 25, and 26, in Nashville, Tenn., his former home.

Note 2. Voucher No. 1271, April 2–8, 1934

This was a trip to New Orleans via Cincinnati, Nashville, and Baton Rouge, returning via Vicksburg, Miss. Mr. Roundtree does not show on his expense account that he was in Vicksburg, but the transportation requests show that he procured a ticket to Vicksburg at Government expense.

Note 3. Voucher No. 1723, May 21–24, 1934

This was a trip to Cincinnati, Ohio, by train, then by a privately owned car to Louisville, Ky., where a convention was held, then by train to Charlottesville, Va., where another convention was held.

Note 4. Voucher No. 1994, June 12–18, 1934

This was a trip to Elizabeth City, N. C., by way of Norfolk, Va., and return via Norfolk with a stop over the week end at Virginia Beach, a seashore resort. Mr. Roundtree had with him on this trip his wife and daughter, who occupied the same stateroom on board the vessel from Washington to Norfolk, according to the records of the transportation company.

Note 5. Voucher No. 3527, December 4–11, 1934

This was a trip to Oklahoma City and return via Memphis and Nashville, Tenn. Mr. Roundtree spent the week end in Nashville, Tenn., his former home.

Note 6. Voucher No. 4933, March 28–April 9, 1935

This was a trip to Jacksonville, Orlando, Miami, and Tampa, Fla., returning via Memphis and Nashville, Tenn., and Mr. Roundtree spent the week end at Nashville, Tenn., his former home.

Note 7. Voucher No. 6253, June 9–27, 1935

This was a trip to Portland, Oreg.; San Francisco, Los Angeles, and San Diego, Calif.; and return from San Francisco by airplane. The expense voucher of Mr. Roundtree does not show that he attended a convention at Coronado Beach, Calif., nor does it show that he was in Santa Monica, Calif.; however, the voucher of Mr. C. E. Berry, an employee of the Federal Home Loan Bank of Los Angeles, shows that he was accompanied in his automobile by Mr. Roundtree, Mr. Catlett, and Mr. Catlett's sister, Mrs. Shaw, from Los Angeles to Santa Monica to attend a dinner given by Mr. Hurford, president of the Los Angeles Bank, in honor of Mr. Catlett and Mr. Roundtree. Although the voucher of Mr. Roundtree shows that he traveled by privately owned automobile from Los Angeles to San Francisco, Mr. Berry's voucher shows that he left Beverly Hills at 8 a. m., accompanied by Mr. Roundtree, and arrived in San Francisco at 9 p. m., the same day.

Note 8. Voucher No. 2544, April 7–19, 1937

Mr. Roundtree arrived at Nashville, Tenn., his former home, April 8, and remained there until April 13. The voucher does not show why he was there; however, he was reimbursed for his expenses for the period. Mr. Roundtree left Nashville for Memphis and Dallas, Tex., then back to Nashville for the week end, making two week ends in Nashville in succession during this period of travel.

Note 9. Voucher No. 390209, August 8–14, 1938

This was more or less a week-end trip to New York, Philadelphia, and New Haven, Conn., apparently for the purpose of a vacation at some given point, since Mr. Roundtree reports being on vacation at New Haven, Conn., commencing at 5:30 p. m. August 10, 1938, at which point he arrived at 11:15 a. m. same date. Mr. Roundtree used his privately owned car for this trip.

Note 10. Voucher No. 1320, April 14–26, 1938

The object of this trip was apparently to visit Nashville, Tenn., the former home of Mr. Roundtree. He and his family left Washington, D. C., in his private automobile at 5: 30 a. m. April 14 and arrived in Nashville at 6: 45 p. m. the following day. Mr. Roundtree was on duty April 16 to April 20, inclusive, in Nashville, and from noon April 20 to 6:00 a. m. April 25 he was on annual leave, at the expiration of which he left Nashville and arrived in Washington, D. C., at 5 p. m. April 26. The expenses of this trip were paid by the Insurance Corporation although there are only two associations in Nashville which were insured in 1935 and 1937. Both were apparently in good condition and there were no applications on file for insurance from any other associations in Nashville.

This House will be interested to know that Mr. F. W. Hancock, member of the Board, is apparently the only official who remains in Washington and attends to his duties. He is one of the few supervisory officials of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation who does not charge the Government for week-end excursions, vacations, football games, sun baths, fishing, and bathing. And I want to emphasize the fact that Mr. Hancock was formerly a Member of this House. He came to Washington as a representative of the people and has carried over into his present office a high sense of respect for the people he serves.

Mr. Speaker, from the evidence I have presented here today it is perfectly clear that this House should make a complete and thorough investigation of these three agencies of the Government. A great deal has been said about bureaucracy. Here is bureaucracy at its very worst. Here are appointive officials, occupying high positions of power and influence, receiving salaries of $10,000 and $8,500 per year. But they have the nerve to charge the Government for trips to their homes and for vacation tours. They have the nerve to charge our people the expense of carrying on their personal business ventures, when at the same time they are employed by the Government to devote their full time to serving the people. They are defrauding the Government, the Congress, and the people.

It is, indeed, a pathetic picture. Thousands of our people are losing their homes through foreclosures. Thousands of our people are paying interest on loans on their homes. Yet we find these officials literally enjoying themselves at Government expense and at the same time receiving a high salary from the people.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a resolution for a complete investigation. It is necessary that we have this investigation in order that we may know the full story, and I guarantee some startling disclosures will result. I cannot begin to explain the manner in which accounts are juggled, "administrative costs" shifted to "nonadministrative," and how these bureaucrats are lining their own pockets with money that should not be theirs.

There is not a Member of this House, on either side of the aisle, who, if he would only look into the facts, would not agree with me that the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation need a real investigation. All this I have discussed today is petty thievery. If men occupying places of responsibility where they handle millions and millions of dollars would stoop to petty thievery, I can well imagine the kind of thing we will discover once we investigate the activities of these officials and make our own accounting of their use of funds in the nonadministrative category.

I have taken only one item in the administrative expense category, and I have shown conclusively, from the findings of the General Accounting Office, that thousands and thousands of dollars are being spent by these officials for personal pleasure and personal business. What will we find if we ever investigate the use made of nonadministrative funds? It is our duty to conduct such an investigation.

Mr. GIFFORD. The chairman of the Expenditures Committee is in front of the gentleman and he looks shocked.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman make the statement that the General Accounting Office advised him that this money was spent for personal pleasure rather than official business?

Mr. CHURCH. I made the statement that I copied the records of the General Accounting Office in its investigation which it sent to the Attorney General and to Jesse Jones. Its conclusions are in that report just as I have stated them here. These are exact copies of that report and investigation.

Mr. COCHRAN. I understood there were some people discharged from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation who threatened to furnish certain records to Members of Congress unless they were reinstated. I did not know the gentleman had discussed this matter with those people until he just mentioned it.

Mr. CHURCH. I have not discussed it with those people who have been fired. This has the dignity of the contents of a report sent by the General Accounting Office to the Administrator of the Federal Loan Agency, as I stated. They are official records. Furthermore, I have asked for them for weeks, and I was never furnished the information until I went over there as a Member of Congress and made a copy of the record myself.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman will recall when he made his speech last July I insisted that a report be made to the Congress through the Committee on Expenditures concerning the charges the gentleman made against Mr. Fallon, and I placed that report in the RECORD.

Mr. CHURCH. I appreciate the gentleman's cooperation at that time.

Mr. COCHRAN. It will be found in the RECORD of July 22, 1939.

I do not think any Member of this House will condone the illegal expenditure of Government funds; but until I have the facts I do not propose to pass judgment on such a serious charge that a public official is guilty of misusing such funds.

May I ask the gentleman if he has talked to Mr. Fahey or any of the others he accuses of spending this money illegally and requested an explanation?

Mr. CHURCH. I have written Mr. Fred W. Brown, the Comptroller General. I have made my statement here today based solely upon the General Accounting Office records and the hearings of the Committee on Appropriations. If you will read the RECORD tomorrow, you will see what the investigators have to say.

Mr. COCHRAN. I certainly propose to read the RECORD. Much data has been inserted of which I have no knowledge; only by reading the RECORD can I get it. I know, as I said before, there were some men who threatened the members of these organizations if they were discharged or were not reinstated who said they were going to give out some facts which they had secured from the records. The gentleman states, however, that he did not discuss this matter with them or secure the information from them, that he got it from the General Accounting Office?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. As I understood the gentleman, he said in his opinion these trips were not justified?

Mr. CHURCH. The Comptroller General himself questions the justification for these trips. That is why he submitted this information to the Administrator of the Federal Loan Agency for comment.

Mr. COCHRAN. I take it it will be up to those accused to justify the expenditures, not a Member of Congress.

Does not the gentleman feel that the General Accounting Office will recover that money from the individuals if it is shown beyond question the money was spent for personal rather than official business?

Mr. CHURCH. I understand so.

Mr. COCHRAN. Of course, I had no knowledge of what the gentleman was going to say today and I know nothing about any of the charges he has made and the trips to which he has referred, other than as to Mr. Fallon; but I may say that as far as Mr. Fallon is concerned, based upon the statement the gentleman made last July, I thought Mr. Fallon's explanation was fair and honest and that it was a proper defense in reference to the expenditures the gentleman then charged him with making. Mr. Fallon not only explained in detail the business of the organization he attended to, but he also went into detail in reference to his personal business, to his family, in order to show that he was not, as charged at that time, visiting a certain home which he was alleged to have owned, because, as I recall it, he showed that he did not own the home.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Fallon attempted to make an explanation, but made a very flimsy explanation of that situation at that time. The General Accounting Office is handicapped in not being able to investigate the nonadministrative funds as well as the administrative. It cannot therefore get all the facts. The Board is able to shift the expenditures from one fund to the other to prevent a complete audit.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have here the RECORD containing the letter that was sent me by Mr. Fahey, together with the memorandum Mr. Fallon submitted. The explanation did not appear to me to be flimsy, and I do not believe it will appear to anybody else who will read it to be flimsy. It is a statement of facts. Unless someone can assail those facts, I repeat, he has made a fair and honest explanation.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman would not criticize the report of the Comptroller General and his request that these expenditures be explained? This request was made as far back as February, and the Board members have not done anything about it. I have written several letters to the General Accounting Office and could not get the information. I am claiming no more than is in the official record of an office, directly responsible to Congress, in checking expenditures.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is something the gentleman heretofore did not submit. Of course, we know nothing about that and will not know anything about it until we read it in the RECORD tomorrow. I cannot speak of something I have not read. I have the greatest respect for the Comptroller General.

Mr. CHURCH. When I spoke on this subject before, I was just scratching the surface. I have been trying to get this information ever since last year. I have written several letters, and I have finally gotten it.

I am glad the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is here today. He is one of the most valuable Members of this House. I do hope that the gentleman and other members of his committee will now insist that these reports be brought in, and assist me in getting the Committee on Rules to demand an investigation. If the gentleman's committee will do this, that would satisfy me. I have no personal grievance against any one of these men, but I have an utter contempt for any petty thievery that takes the taxpayers' money at any time and takes from the poor H. O. L. C. borrowers.

I prefer to give the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] the chance at this session to go into this question. I hope the gentleman will give me every support and get this investigation. That is all I am asking.

Mr. COCHRAN. I wish to assure the gentleman that his remarks made here today, and what he is placing in the RECORD, will not go unnoticed.

Mr. CHURCH. I appreciate that, and I believe the House appreciates it.

Mr. COCHRAN. As far as I am concerned, no statement has ever gone unnoticed that has been made on the floor accusing an official of illegal activities. I do feel that before any investigation is ordered some opportunity should be given the other side to reply to these very serious charges the gentleman has made on his responsibility as a Member of this House. I cannot conceive that anybody would be expected to overlook such statements. Therefore, I again assure the gentleman that the matter is going to be called to the attention of the proper officials for an explanation. I think they should welcome an opportunity to reply.

Mr. CHURCH. I have been trying ever since last year to get all the facts.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. I wonder if the gentleman's remarks were prompted by the statement appearing in the RECORD this morning on the good work the Federal Home Loan Bank Board has been doing in recent years? It appears in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD beginning at page 1799. I placed it in the RECORD yesterday. Did these remarks prompt the gentleman's charges?

Mr. CHURCH. I recognize that the H. O. L. C. has done a great deal of good, but that does not justify petty thievery by supervisory officials.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman just enumerate what the thievery is, just one, two, three, four?

Mr. CHURCH. I have carefully and formally stated them in the RECORD. I am making very serious charges. They are in the RECORD. They are backed up by the records of the General Accounting Office, and they are right here in the RECORD.

Mr. PATMAN. Name one and state just what it is——

Mr. CHURCH. I have given the details of all of them, and I recited a number of week-end trips at Government expense.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman presume that a week-end trip is pleasure? Do not some of these officials take advantage of week-end trips to work?

Mr. CHURCH. The General Accounting Office has not presumed it.

Mr. PATMAN. You are basing your presumption upon what some official has done.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois rose.

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. The gentleman has stated that they were all-powerful. I think that is probably an overestimation, and I hope the gentleman will draw the attention of the House to the fact that they have now a bill, upon which a rule has been granted, which is to come before this House granting them greatly increased power and burdening the Government with much greater responsibility for their activities.

Mr. CHURCH. I want to thank the gentlewoman from Illinois for her contribution, and if there is no one else who desires to make any inquiries, I yield back the balance of my time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in an extension of the remarks I made today a statement made before the Military Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the remarks I made today in the delivery of a gavel to the Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bills (H. R. 8226 and H. R. 8370) and Private Calendar Nos. 619 and 625, which were by inadvertence objected to, be restored to the Private Calendar so that they may be considered on the next Private Calendar day.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not think the gentleman should take advantage of the official objectors who are absent.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have talked with one of them.

Mr. COCHRAN. Has the gentleman talked to all of the official objectors?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have talked to one of them. The other one I could not find. They can object next week as well as they could object today.

Mr. COCHRAN. If we are going to begin such a policy now, after the calendar has been called and the objectors have gone, everybody will be getting up here and asking unanimous consent to go back to their bills.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am not trying to do that. I have talked to the objector.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is a bad procedure to follow. If the gentleman can state that he has talked to all the objectors, I am not going to object.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether the objectors on the minority side have agreed to this, and if they have not I am going to object, in view of the fact they are not here at the moment.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request for the present.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to inject myself into this matter. It seems appropriate as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. We in the minority plead for these investigations entirely in vain. I have offered many resolutions during the past few years seeking to get investigations. One was about the joy ride of Jacob Baker and others to Europe on relief money. The General Accounting Office found that they spent the money improperly and ordered them to pay it back, but they will not pay it back. The Attorney General will never do anything about it.

When it comes to investigations relating to expense accounts, we immediately must say that all joy rides of all new dealers must not be questioned. The New Deal has been a joy ride from the beginning. We cannot stop it. Even our Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments cannot do anything. Those in control here will not let any investigating be done.

I seldom if ever engage in attacks on personalities. Even when I speak of the President of the United States, I speak of him usually as the "White House." But I have a duty to object and consider improper expenditures. Appreciative as I am of Mr. Fahey, of Massachusetts, it is very strange that it is so convenient, because he is on the Home Loan Bank Board, that he should have business every week end in Boston. He could probably make it convenient. Congressmen are nearly all a distance from their homes, and we might like to go home week ends, but the small amount we are allowed for travel will not let us go more than once or twice, not every week end. We could easily assign business relating to our work.

There may not be petty thievery involved here, and of course I do not claim that, but every man here knows and feels that we are perfectly well aware of the tremendous advantages taken of the funds used by the bureaucratic new dealers.

Again, I rose to my feet to say that it is no use to expect anything of the Committee on Expenditures, of which I am a member. It is no use to expect anything from any other committee, in the way of investigation. Matters are referred to the committees; the chairman writes the party for explanation; with only an evasive and brief explanation the matter is laid on the table within the 10 days. You can do nothing about it. Let them have their joy rides! It is to be expected these days. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, let me allude for a moment to the observation made by my good friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK] about assailing an agency by assailing an individual. This Congress could appropriate all the money in kingdom come and set up all the agencies that are necessary, but until human personality is addressed to those agencies to make them function, they mean exactly nothing. You can give the Home Owners' Loan Corporation $3,000,000,000 and authorize them to make a million loans and give them plenary power, but until some personality addresses himself or herself to the task and gives the direction, it is just an abortive attempt. So we have to start with the personality that shapes the policy of an agency and determines the thing that is going to be done. Consequently, it is only fair and proper when we undertake to reproach and criticize governmental agencies to criticize the head of the agency, because that is where responsibility lies. That is No. 1.

No. 2: It occurs to me that the Congress has been terribly derelict in its duty in being so careless in drafting legislation similar to that under which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation operates today. I will give you an example. When they came before the Committee on Appropriations last year we asked them for a justification for having earmarked $40,000 to set up the group hospitalization plan in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The General Counsel sat before the committee, and there, in broad language, he undertook to justify that expenditure. No reasonable person making a common-sense interpretation of that language could have arrived at so strained a conclusion; and yet they took the language that was in the law and arrived at that conclusion and expended $40,000 on the theory that the Congress had given them a job to do and that, within the confines of that job, it became necessary to keep everybody in the organization healthy and free from tonsillitis and appendicitis and all the other ills to which human flesh is heir.

This is going pretty far. I assume that, perhaps, they think they can find justification for making week-end trips to Boston and to Nashville and to New York City, yet it seems to me the offices in distant cities are closed on Saturday afternoons and on week ends. If they go out of Washington on Saturday morning they would find a closed office at noon when they got up there. They could go to church on Sunday morning and then catch a train late in the afternoon and arrive back in Washington for duty on Monday morning. Offhand, I would say it would be pretty difficult to justify that kind of a recurring week-end expenditure when everybody knows that the county and the State and the Federal offices are closed at that time, and as far as the remarks of my good friend from Texas about a concentration of the building and loan activities in New England are concerned, must I refresh your recollection that there are 12 of these home-loan banks in the country and that we have some out in our country. They are not all up in New England by any means.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. And is it not rather strange that none of these trips was made out to Chicago, none was made to St. Louis, none was recorded for Omaha, none was recorded for St. Louis, none was recorded for Dallas and none for Atlanta. Why were they all into the same area? Do you not have building and loan activities in Texas? Do they not have building and loan activities in Oregon and Washington and Illinois? It seems rather singular that all week-end trips were along one piece of electric track running from Washington to New York and from New York up to Boston. There is something very singular about that and I think it would merit the investigation of the Congress.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me continue, as I have only 5 minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. It would not be unusual for the other members of the Board to take charge of other sections of the country. Does not the Federal Reserve Board do that very thing?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am speaking of those mentioned in the discussion this afternoon. How strange it is that it took them to Boston and not into some of the other sections of the country. But now alluding for a moment to the fact that the interest rates have been reduced. Oh, my dear friend from Texas, do you forget that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has foreclosed on about 81,000 properties?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 more minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. They came and testified that they took over and then foreclosed 81,000 properties. Not the hard-hearted, grasping bankers. That is Uncle Sam doing it, and then they testified that they own 78,000 more pieces of property, properties of the citizens of this country; and when you refer to the Hoover days so often and talk about the terrible things that were done to the citizenry when the bankers and the building and loan associations were reaching out and through the spectral processes of foreclosures were taking away the homes of the citizens, bear in mind it is your Government that is doing it today under your tutelage and under your direction. Under the New Deal philosophy you are doing it today. What accounting have you for that, I ask you?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. With pleasure I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I know the gentleman from Illinois would not want to leave the impression that he disapproves of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Definitely not.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. If the gentleman will permit me to continue—foreclosing property when, as a matter of last resort, it has developed that the person who has made the loan cannot ultimately pay the loan, because, after all, they are loans and not gifts.

Mr. DIRKSEN. My good friend from Virginia has put his finger right on it, and I ask the gentleman now to give attention for a moment with regard to this observation: Take the building and loan associations of 1930 to 1932. Those folks were administering the money of other people—not their own money. Would you have them desist from foreclosure when the property was being depreciated and the installments had not been paid? They were doing the thing that they were mandated to do under the laws of every State in the Nation covering building and loans and banking systems. No, indeed. I think Mr. Fahey is doing the right thing to recapture for the Treasury and the taxpayers of the country those delinquent properties when all other efforts have failed, for otherwise they probably would represent a dead loss. But must you come and put the tarred stick on us because in the days of 1930 to 1932 those who were acting as stewards of other people's money were doing the same thing?

Now, to get around to the interest rates for just a moment—these lower interest rates. You are paying for gold $35 an ounce, and every ounce of gold must be reflected in the excess reserves, and it must be reflected in the deposits in the country, and here today you have a great empire of stagnant capital; and the result is what? It is to freeze a static unemployment level that has been on the doorstep of this Congress since we came here in 1933 for that memorable 100-day session, and it is here now. A few billions were expended before 1932, but what has been expended since that time? I share with you a great solicitude and anxiety to find the remedy, but do not put the tarred stick over on us because we have given you four times as much money for this purpose as was used from 1929 to 1932, and, according to the report the unemployment level is almost as large today as it was in October 1932, after we had started turning the corner. The other day I surveyed all the bills that have gone on the books of the Seventy-third Congress, the Seventy-fourth Congress, the Seventy-fifth Congress, the Seventy-sixth Congress, dealing with what? Inadequate farm prices, jobs, hoping to keep this country on a peaceful keel, and, finally, to find a little profit for some of the idle dollars that are reposing in the storm cellars of the country today.

That was in 1933. Here we are gathered on the 2d of April of 1940, in this same Chamber, and what are the problems today? Jobs for our unemployed, inadequate farm prices, stagnant capital for which there is no profit. All this through 11 sessions of Congress, with a national debt going up to the statutory ceiling, and the same problems are reposing here on the threshold of the Nation. If you must make accounting, if you must tell us that there has been effective work, where is the answer for all the money that has been expended? Where is the answer, now that the people of the country are becoming keenly anxious about the national debt, with its annual interest charge of over $1,050,000,000? Where is the answer, my good friend from Texas?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEY

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas, the author of the chain-store legislation, made a very reasonable request. He asked us to cite instances where money had been misused. I am not talking about petty stealing now. I am talking about the misuse of public funds. I will give you two instances and I will cite you to the record and I will cite you to the statute that should have prevented that misuse of public funds.

The first one is found in the National Labor Relations Act itself, where provision is made that no funds appropriated for the use of that agency shall be used to collect certain sorts of information which can be obtained from the Labor Department. The provision to which reference is made is found in section 4, subdivision (a), of the N. L. R. A. and it provides that—

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statistical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor.

There is no question as to what that language means.

If you will take the hearings before the Smith committee, you will find from the records of the Board itself, from the testimony of Madden, from the testimony of Dr.—not "Judge"—Saposs, as he was designated, that he has been collecting and has been paid for collecting the very kind of information that that statute says shall not be collected and paid for through the use of funds given to the Board.

If you will refer to page 374 of the preliminary report of the special House committee—the Smith committee—under date of March 30, you will find this statement:

B. DIVISION OF ECONOMIC RESEARCH

> Carrying on certain nonlegal investigations is the division of economic research under the direction of David J. Saposs. The Division's work consists in (5):
>
> 1. The preparation of statistical data for the use of the Board in its annual reports. Congressional investigations (6), etc.; and > 2. Supplying economic material for use in the development of Board cases.

The foregoing statement is founded upon the testimony of Saposs given before the committee.

Now, there is another instance. If you will refer to section 201, title XVIII, of the United States Code, you will find a statute which provides that—

> Use of appropriations to pay for personal service to influence Members of Congress to favor or oppose legislation. No part of the money appropriated by any act shall, in the absence of express authorization by Congress, be used directly or indirectly to pay for any personal service, advertisement, telegram, telephone, letter, printed or written matter, or other device intended or designed to influence in any manner a Member of Congress to favor or oppose, by vote or otherwise, any legislation or appropriation by Congress, whether before or after the introduction of any bill or resolution proposing such legislation or appropriations; but this shall not prevent officers and employees of the United States from communicating to Members of Congress, on the request of any Member of Congress, through the proper official channels, requests for legislation or appropriations which they deem necessary for the efficient conduct of the public business.

Then it provides:

> Any officer or employee of the United States who, after notice and hearing by the superior officer vested with the power of removing him, is found to have violated or attempted to violate this section, shall be removed by such superior officer from office or employment. Any officer or employee of the United States who violates or attempts to violate this section shall also be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

Now for the proof that the N. L. R. B. has failed to remember the statute and to obey its provisions, permit me to again call your attention to the hearings of the special House committee investigating the Labor Board and the Wagner Act, the testimony to which reference is made comes not from those who are prejudiced against either the act or the Board, but from the members of the Board, its staff, and its records. From page 381 of the report of the Smith committee, let me quote:

> The field offices took an active part in the lobbying done by the Board. One regional director reported that all persons whom he had interviewed with respect to testifying before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor had amendments in mind, and therefore he did not think they would be useful.
>
> A former Board secretary, Benedict Wolf, after leaving the services of the Board wrote identical letters to all regional directors, except one, asking them to stimulate sentiment in local American Federation of Labor unions against amendments proposed by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor. The one regional director was carefully omitted because Wolf feared the A. F. of L. friends of that individual.
>
> Another regional director replied:
> "Am wholeheartedly in agreement with what you say, and for the past month have been following a somewhat similar campaign with the union in my vicinity."

This report is substantiated by the testimony referred to in the report, and you have but to read the record to have the facts before you. So to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], who asked for specific charges and the evidence on which they were founded, I offer the foregoing. There you have your specific charges and the record of a committee of this Congress as proof of the charge. It is a matter of common knowledge that the Attorney General of the United States was asked to take action on this latter charge, and that up to this time he has failed to bring any action whatever against either Madden or any of the Board attorneys or employees who lobbied in violation of that statute, if the statute covers such activities.

My understanding is that the Attorney General refused to express an opinion when asked to do so by the Smith committee or by its chairman, this on the ground that it was not his duty to do so. However, it is his duty to prosecute violations of the Federal statutes when the facts are laid before him, and if there is any reason why he should not institute proceedings other than that the facts do not constitute a violation of the statute, doubtless Congress would be glad to have those reasons.

So what is the use of Republicans presenting to your committees and to your departments evidence of the misuse of public funds, of the diversion of public funds? Once more I want to refer to that statement of CARTER GLASS, the senior Senator from Virginia, made on the floor of the Senate on the 24th of June 1937, when he said:

> The last election was carried by people who were getting favors from the Government, people who were subsidized by the Government, people who were on relief rolls.

This last statement is not of course borne out by any evidence that I have cited. It is nevertheless a statement made on the floor of the United States Senate by one of the greatest Senators who has ever sat in that distinguished body. It is the opinion of a great Senator from the State of Virginia. To you, I have offered two instances where Federal statutes, according to good opinion, have been violated; where the proof is at hand, yet no effort is made to end the improper practice.

So do not expect us always to back up everything we say by citing the record, because we get nowhere when we do. If you will take care of a few of the violations we have pointed out to you, if you will get some action, where the funds of the Federal Government have been misused, then we will go on down the list and give you plenty more. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include an article that appeared in the Birmingham Age-Herald of April 2, 1940, on the relief problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEY

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I will use, I will discuss one little matter that I referred to slightly in questioning the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], and to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], replied.

I am very fond of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. He and I have gone out over the country together a little in debate. He is a cultured, refined, scholarly gentleman, genteel and charming.

I do want to take time, however, to cross swords with him—not that I am able to, but I am willing—on one measure that arises here, and which I think is serious enough when it comes to legislation; that is, that the human element, the individual case, does not rise to the dignity of station given it here when, in attempts at legislation involving thousands of dollars and thousands of people, in fact, millions of dollars, we assail the individual that happens to be at the head of this or that agency or group at the time.

I am not up here with a brief for the Honorable John H. Fahey. I do not know the intimate details of the situation in regard to the home-loan bank. It is but natural, however, that in a board of the size of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, someone in control or direction of the business affairs pursuing the natural course of things must of necessity travel.

I think we too easily fall out and quibble over minutia, leaving the major thing untouched. We do this so frequently, especially when we feel that there is another party on the other side and we are entirely on this side of the fence. Only last week we had up measures involving the affairs of this country, involving the wholesome, national moral health of our people, involving N. Y. A., but it seemed that most of the attacks were directed, not against the legislation or its merits, but against men. Instead of directing our attention to whole nature of the legislation before this body we found attacks being made on Aubrey Williams in N. Y. A.; Colonel Fleming in C. C. C., although he has been at the head of that organization only a few months, much less than a year; Dr. Saposs in the matter of the wage and hour legislation and the Labor Board. Instead of attacking the wage and hour legislation fundamentally, and on its merits, they attacked Saposs, a man, a mere human who may die any time.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. Now, the gentleman has shed so much lack of light on so many subjects that I am afraid the time would not be worth it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I merely want to make a correction. I was talking about the National Labor Relations Act.

Mr. PATRICK. I would like to yield but I am afraid to risk it.

The facts are, seriously, that as we approach matters of legislation, if there is opposition to any measure, instead of going before the people of the United States and saying that the measure is either good or bad, that it should be enacted or should not, the man standing at the head of the bureau that is charged to administer the law is attacked and assailed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATRICK. A human being may die tomorrow. No matter how powerful a man may stand as a bureaucrat, or whether or not one may personally like him or his politics, or how well he may or may not execute his position of trust, he may retire, he may be kicked out, or he may die; but the laws we enact here, if they are sound, should stand for a long time. But how can we hope to pass strong, healthy, invigorating legislation to take care of the needs of the Nation by the petty method of attacking men who happen to be at any given time in a position of power? It is strange that laws passed under such arguments stand as long as they do. Such arguments should not be heard in this Chamber, this forum of debate, at the Nation's head.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The practice is growing up in some quarters to consider a law to mean what an administrative group says it means. No less a person than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] has introduced in the House the so-called Logan-Walter bill in the hope that the things that an administrative group read into the law may be reviewed in the courts of the land. That is why there is so much discussion about one man, two men, three men—why it is so important in interpreting the laws of the country today. That is why the individual becomes so important in connection with every piece of legislation.

Mr. PATRICK. Any law is only that which the human beings that administer it can carry out. But their actions are always subject to review and can be carried only as far as boards of control permit, or even the Supreme Court of the United States can be appealed to if necessary. Any law, of course, has to be administered by human beings. It is passed in the first instance by human beings, and all law has been subject to the frailties of human beings since time immemorial. But that does not mean that we should scale a law up or down according to our feeling for the man who may temporarily be in the position of its administrator.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I understood the gentleman to say that we should not make attacks on individuals, that we should change the law. Under that theory, and according to the gentleman's logic, we would not do anything to a man who stole. We would simply attack the law.

Mr. PATRICK. The gentleman is hearing so little when so much has been said.

Mr. HOFFMAN. There is so little to what has been said that sometimes it does not take me long to understand it.

Mr. PATRICK. That may be true, but I would rather have it weighed on heavier scales. Is that all the gentleman has to say? I am quite disappointed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

DEFICIENCY BILL CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

PEYOTISM AS AN EMERGENT INDIAN CULTURE

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I was afraid that I might get inflamed about what I am going to speak, so I wrote it down. I do not think anyone in the House can remember my having read my remarks heretofore. They are very brief.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to a very remarkable article appearing in a Government publication this month.

The title of the article is "Peyotism as an Emergent Indian Culture," and it appears in a little magazine known as Indians at Work, which is issued by the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The article is by Vincenzo Petrullo, who is a Ph. D.

Lots of my colleagues will not know what "peyotism" is. For your information, it is a so-called religion invented by Indians or Mexicans, centering around the eating of "peyote," which is a drug made out of some sort of Mexican plant which induces a lengthy stupor, during which the subject has weird dreams and delusions of grandeur, similar to that brought about by the use of opium and other drugs.

It seems to me that the publication of this article in a Government publication at least implies that the use of this drug, peyote, is condoned, if not actually recommended, by our Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Dr. Petrullo, the author, says in one place:

> In peyotism there is fused much of the ancient religious experiences of the Indians and some phases of Christianity. In a sense, then, the Indian has become modern or universal in spirit. He recognizes the existence of systems other than his own, and by fusing the two together he builds something original and perhaps richer, for his own needs, at least, than either his own ancient system or the Christian. For peyotism is not only a religion but a way of life, a life that accommodates itself to the present and hopes for the future.

In the name of common sense and decency, I want to protest against the publication of this article and this seeming effort of our Bureau of Indian Affairs to promote drug addiction among our Indians.

I do not know Dr. Petrullo. I do not know from what source he got his idea that peyotism is a richer religion for the Indians than the Christianity which our churches have been trying to teach them, and with great success, for hundreds of years.

Dr. Petrullo says further in his article that the peyote eaters have organized the Native American Church, and may seek converts among the white people who live near Indian settlements.

I am not concerned with the possibility of their success. I feel that our basis of religion will stand. I do not think that any Mexican drug will be sufficiently strong to induce our people to quit the religions of their fathers.

But in the name of our mothers, who taught us at their knees to pray, I do protest this condonement of any such infusion of fantastic new religious ideas among our Indians. It seems to me that, instead of running articles in the publication that is sent out to all Indian agencies and to selected officials of the Bureau and Indian leaders, praising peyotism as a richer religion than Christianity, that the Indian Bureau had better be engaged in stamping out the traffic in this dangerous drug and the spread of this damnable doctrine.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, before I came to the floor and after I had written these few short remarks directed at this great work of Dr. Petrullo, I called the Bureau of Indian Affairs and asked to speak to the editor of Indians at Work. I got the gentleman on the phone. I fussed at him a little, about permitting such an article as this to appear in a Government publication, and the editor said, "Well, of course, I am not trying to dodge responsibility for this, but you know I did not edit this issue. This was a special issue." I said, "Will you be so kind as to tell me who edited this issue?" The gentleman was very sorry but he could not inform me. He said it was a special issue, on special subjects, and given special attention by somebody especially, he knew not who.

Then I talked to another fellow down there. He said, "Why, Congressman, you should not expose, you should not condemn, the high purposes of this learned scholar who has a Ph. D. from the Pennsylvania University at one time or another because something has got to be done about this thing. We have either got to accept peyotism or condemn it, and this is a learned discussion of the whole subject. It is not propaganda at all."

I talked to one other gentleman in the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and he is sending some hearings that have been had some place in the Congress on this subject in order to convince me that they are justified in running that tripe in Government publications. I will read it of course. One of these fellows said to me, "Peyotism is religion and its advocacy has been going on for a long time."

Well, that reminds me of a story. An Irishman was walking down the street one day and he saw a Jew standing in front of a shop. The Irishman walked up and jumped on the Jew and like to beat him to death. When he got through and let him up, the Jew said, "Now, why did you do that? Why did you jump on me? I never saw you before." The Irishman said, "Faith and bejazes, and you fellows killed Christ." The Jew says, "But that was my forefathers 2,000 years or more ago." The Irishman said, "It don't make a bit of difference to me; I just heard about it yesterday." [Laughter.]

I do not care how long the advocacy of peyotism as a religion to replace the good, old-fashioned religion of my forefathers has been going on, I just heard about it today, and I am going to try to do something about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman has made an interesting and informative address. He has explained how the peyotl bean is being shipped or bootlegged in here from Mexico, and how the poor Indians, while under the influence of peyotl, have dreams and hallucinations. The gentleman, of course, is familiar with the fact that peyotl is used on special occasions by many good Indians of various tribes in Oklahoma, many of whom have no money, land, or income, and that this peyotl bean is said to make them feel very rich and carefree. Has my able and distinguished colleague from Oklahoma given any thought to the suggestion that we might import more peyotl beans for some of our other distressed people in order to make them feel rich and carefree during these trying times?

Mr. NICHOLS. Of course, I do not think that the state of mind justifies the strong medicine necessary to produce this false feeling of affluence.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. This is the first time I heard anything about this peyotl bean. But I am wondering, in view of the fact it is claimed that it leads to delusions of grandeur on the part of those who partake of this bean, if perhaps the infusion of peyotl beans has not reached some of our high places here in Washington.

Mr. NICHOLS. Of course, I know to what the gentleman refers. I have been a Member of Congress for almost 6 years now, a very short time, and I have taken part in voting for and fighting for some of the legislation that I presume the gentleman refers to. During that time some of my very beloved friends on the Republican side of the House have stood side by side with me in voting for much of this same kind of legislation; and being hesitant about hurting anybody's feelings, I simply will not attempt to comment further upon whether or not any party in a high place has been eating peyotl beans. I do not know.

Mr. KEEFE. I may say to the gentleman that I did not intend to reflect on the passage of legislation, but I did have in mind perhaps that maybe in some of the departmental activities where bureaucracy has grown to the extent that it has attracted the attention of not only the Congress but the entire country, some of these bureaucrats that have been put in charge of the laudable activities and purposes of some of this fine legislation may be possessed of delusions of grandeur.

Mr. NICHOLS. I am not one of those who are willing to go out and jump on the bureaucrats for the things that they do as long as I am a Member of this body. This body can kick its own pants if there is anything wrong with the bureaucrats in Government. We control them, we run them, we give them the money, and we tell them what they can do and what they cannot do. I am not ready to condemn them. I am ready, if there is anything wrong with them, to condemn the actions of this body. If my party need take the responsibility, then I am ready that my party should brag about the good things they have done instead of fussing about bureaucrats. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made today and include therein certain excerpts and explanations thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

IMPORTS OF RUSSIAN ANTHRACITE COAL

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the majority of the Members of this House are conversant with the fact that the district I represent is located in the heart of the great coal fields of Pennsylvania. In other words, the Twenty-third District of Pennsylvania is one of the largest coal districts in the United States.

Many times have I drawn a word picture of the desolation faced by former prosperous communities now reduced to veritable "ghost towns" because of the many ills which have beset the coal industry.

You are all familiar with the many substitute fuels which are in part responsible for the conditions facing the industry today.

Since becoming a Member of Congress I have discussed a number of times the injurious effects to the coal industry by the T. V. A., importation of foreign oil, unregulated natural gas, pipe lines, and so forth.

Today I want to discuss the importation of Russian anthracite coal and its devastating effect upon the entire coal industry. Under an agreement between Soviet Russia and the United States negotiated in 1934 and since renewed annually, Russia has shipped into the United States the following amount of anthracite coal:

	Net tons
1935	395,413
1936	451,576
1937	266,441
1938	200,480
1939	219,901

Under the present agreement, expiring in August 1940, Russia can ship to the United States 400,000 tons.

The output of Russian coal has been increasing very rapidly. For example, in 1930 the total output of Russian coal mines, including bituminous, was 48,227,474 tons. This increased to 124,561,828 tons in 1938. About 75 percent of this tonnage was produced in European Russia.

The United States Tariff Commission reports that in 1928 and 1929 the cost of producing a ton of coal by the Russian Donetz coal trust was $2.20—11 rubles Russian money—per ton. Fifty-one percent of the cost of production was absorbed by salaries and it develops that the Russian miner received slightly in excess of $1 for each ton mined.

According to the United States Tariff Commission, the average monthly salary of all employees of the Russian Donetz coal trust was $48.60, or 243 rubles Russian money.

It is interesting to note the Russian miner in 1927 and 1928 produced on an average of 12.4 tons per month as compared with the Pennsylvania miner, who in 1929 produced on an average of 33 tons per month.

The difference in production between the Russian and American miner is charged to the decreased efficiency of coal-cutting machines and the disorganization of Russian labor.

The average declared value per ton f. o. b. Russian ports in 1937 was $4.81 and the ocean freight rate to New England ports at that time probably averaged $3, or a total of $7.81 per ton, upon arrival at Boston. Ten percent of the coal used in Boston is imported and the average consumer pays $15.25 per ton, slightly higher than the domestic anthracite price.

The principal objection to the importation of Russian coal is the displacement of American anthracite coal, which results in the loss of jobs to our own American coal miners.

From 1935 to 1939 Russia shipped an average of 306,763 tons to the United States. The American anthracite miner digs 2.79 tons per day, and his average working days for a year are 171; thus, he digs approximately 478 tons of coal annually.

By dividing Russia's annual average shipment of 306,763 tons by the American coal miner's annual production of 478 tons, we find that 642 coal miners lose their jobs through the importation of this amount of Russian coal.

The loss of the jobs of 642 coal miners annually may represent an insignificant number at first glance, but when we recall that T. V. A. destroys 21,000 jobs annually followed by Venezuelian oil taking a toll of 20,000 additional jobs annually and unregulated natural gas claiming another 60,000 jobs annually, you will readily understand why it behooves each and every one of us to guard against not only the importation of Russian coal with its constant threat to American jobs but the suppression of every effort aimed at importing any substitute that will take the jobs of many other American workmen.

In my opening remarks I pointed out that the coal industry was suffering from many ills, and I trust that my explanation of the importation of Russian coal will further enlighten every Member of this House that Government-subsidized and encouraged substitutes should have our earnest attention if we are concerned with the rehabilitation of the American coal industry and the American coal miner. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain excerpts from resolutions heretofore passed, and I make a second request to the same effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

REPAYMENT OF HOG-PROCESSING TAXES

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, during the major portion of the last hour we have listened to a rather startling succession of charges concerning petty theft and misappropriations of funds on the part of bureaucrats and board officials as they have erroneously, incorrectly, and perhaps dishonestly used money of the Government for private welfare, amusement, and pleasure. I believe it is a sorry situation that Government has sunk to such a condition in America that we have to hear that type of charge be made and listen to rejoinders that vary from outright admissions to weak denials of the facts.

However, I do not want to talk about that now. I do wish to discuss another aspect of the same type of outgrowth in this country, the same situation in which Government has become top-heavy, in which we have arrived at something pretty close to the same type of statism which we condemn so cordially when we find it running rampant in Europe or in Asia. Instead of discussing what has been described here this afternoon in an outline and an enumeration of bureaucrats and officials who have been misappropriating money from the Government, I want to discuss the Government's misappropriation of money taken from the individual, quite the opposite trend of misappropriation but an exact manifestation of the same type of overgrown "big bully" type of Government.

I refer to the failure of the Federal Government to repay to the hog raisers of America the processing taxes taken from them at the time the processing tax was in effect in America. That processing tax took from the hog raisers, the farmers of this country, illegally, in direct conflict with constitutional provisions, many millions of dollars which the New Deal authorities have thus far steadfastly refused to repay. The United States Supreme Court has declared that the tax was unfairly, unjustly, and illegally paid by the farmer. The United States Treasury has said:

> We have been unjustly enriched. The farmer should not have paid the tax.

The Bureau of Economics in the Department of Agriculture has said the same thing, although the Secretary of that Department does not favor having the farmer get back these tax refunds. The farmer paid the tax, and he paid it in conflict with the law. Still, our Government, your Government and mine, has failed to repay to these farmers the money illegally taken from them.

On Monday of this week I caused to be sent to every Member of Congress a letter which I am going to ask to include as part of my remarks here this afternoon, as I am very eager that every Member of the House read this letter, reviewing the situation confronting us, explaining the case for the farmer, and asking all fair-minded ladies and gentlemen of the House to sign discharge petition No. 25, which I have placed on the Speaker's rostrum, in an effort to bring from the House Committee on Agriculture Senate Joint Resolution 66, which passed the Senate, which a subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture has considered and reported back favorably, to bring that before us for action, so that the farmers of America can be given that degree of justice.

This afternoon I want to make an especial appeal to the gentlemen and the ladies representing the cities of this country, the industrial areas; those who sometimes erroneously assume that they pay all the taxes simply because the postmark on so many tax-payment-conveying envelopes are mailed out from the large cities of the East; forgetful of the fact that out where I live, where the farmers live, we are the big consumers of America and pay our taxes indirectly by buying the products of industrial areas, so that those industries can profit sufficiently to pay the income tax from the profits drained from the agricultural regions of America.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. And I want to call the attention of those people whose constitutents may include no hog raisers especially to the last paragraph of my letter, because in that I set forth this proposition: I think it would be a tremendously hazardous thing in America if this country, by failure to repay these taxes illegally collected, should establish the precedent that the Federal Government will not rebate taxes which are unwisely or unnecessarily or unfairly paid, because the taxpayers of the big cities and the industries of America almost every year make mistakes in making income-tax returns. If, instead of continuing the fair practice this Government has always followed of rebating to industry and rebating to capitalists the taxes which they have unfairly paid, we are now going to fail to maintain the Government's honor with the taxpayers on the farms in this instance, then the Government soon enough may say to the taxpayer in the city, "Unfortunately, you paid $1,000,000 too much in taxes, but we will not rebate it, we will not disallow it, we will not refund it, we will not give you credit on next year's tax payment, because we succeeded in chiseling the American farmer out of his hog-processing tax some years ago." I appeal to you as a matter of simple honesty, in self-protection of the integrity and honor of this Government in its relations with honest taxpayers, to sign discharge petition No. 25 and to rebate to the American farmer the hog-processing tax illegally exacted from him. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include the letter referred to as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1940.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Have you signed discharge petition No. 25?

If you are among those who have not yet signed this discharge petition, will you give me 2 minutes of your time to suggest reasons why, in justice to the farmers of your own district, and to the taxpayers generally, you should sign this particular petition?

Petition No. 25 simply would bring Senate Joint Resolution 66, which passed the Senate last August, before the House for a vote. Senate Joint Resolution 66 provides for a refund to American hog producers of the processing taxes which they illegally paid before the Supreme Court declared this tax unconstitutional. An appropriation of $58,000,000 was subsequently paid to refund taxes illegally collected, and of this amount $31,000,000 still remains available and appropriated for repayment of hog processing taxes. Senate Joint Resolution 66 simply provides a method for our hog producers to establish their claims for this refund which both the Supreme Court and the United States Treasury have stated were unjustly and illegally paid by the American hog producers.

It has always been a cardinal principle of American taxation that taxes illegally collected shall be refunded to those who pay them. Income taxes are refunded when they are overpaid; the taxes paid by the hog processors were refunded from the above appropriation when the tax was declared void; taxes collected under the Bankhead Cotton Act of 1934, the Kerr Tobacco Act, and the Potato Act of 1935 were also refunded. It now remains for this Government to keep faith with American hog producers by refunding taxes illegally collected from the producers themselves.

America cannot afford to establish the dangerous precedent at this late date of refusing to refund taxes illegally collected. Such a despotic stand would be a long step backward from our traditional policy of fair dealing with all types of honest taxpayers. More important than the money involved and the refunds due the farmers is the importance of maintaining this Government's honor in dealing with taxpayers. To deny justice in this case would place a blot on our national honor that in future years might spread to equal injustices to those who erroneously or unjustly overpay income taxes or other levies. Your signature to petition No. 25 will help Uncle Sam keep faith with John Taxpayer.

Cordially yours,

KARL MUNDT, M. C.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION (H. DOC. NO. 681)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States which was read, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

When I submitted Reorganization Plans I and II at the last regular session of Congress I indicated that certain reorganizations of an intradepartmental character were necessary, but that detailed study would be required for the preparation of specific plans. Since that time the heads of the executive departments and my own office have continued to study the internal organization of the several agencies of the Government. I have considered recommendations made to me as a result of these studies and have found it possible to make a number of needed improvements of organization by administrative action. In other instances I can effect the necessary changes only under the procedure set up in the Reorganization Act of 1939.

I am transmitting herewith Reorganization Plan III, which I have prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the Reorganization Act of 1939 (Public, No. 19, 76th Cong., 1st sess.), approved April 3, 1939; and I declare that with respect to each reorganization made in this plan I have found that such reorganization is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes of section 1 (a) of the act:

1. To reduce expenditures;
2. To increase efficiency;
3. To consolidate agencies according to major purposes;
4. To reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions and by abolishing such as may not be necessary; and
5. To eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

Treasury Department: I am proposing two intradepartmental reorganizations relating to the Treasury Department.

The first reorganization consolidates in a Fiscal Service, under the direction of a permanent Fiscal Assistant Secretary, those functions of the Treasury Department pertaining to financing and fiscal activities. This Fiscal Service will bring together the Office of the Treasurer of the United States, the Office of Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits, and the Public Debt Service, including their various subdivisions and certain other related functions.

Some adjustments are made in the assignment of functions of the units which will comprise the Fiscal Service, and certain changes are made in titles. The net effect of these adjustments is to establish within the Fiscal Service the office of Fiscal Assistant Secretary, the office of the Treasurer of the United States, and a Bureau of Accounts under a Commission of Accounts, and a Bureau of Public Debt under the Commissioner of Public Debt. In addition to responsibility for the administration of these four segments of the Department's operations, the Fiscal Assistant Secretary is vested with the financing functions of the Under Secretary of the Treasury and of the Assistant Secretaries.

The functions brought together in the Fiscal Service are all closely interrelated and are essential parts of the general functions of financing and fiscal control. The internal organization of the Fiscal Service conforms to accepted principles of financial management and provides the framework for adequate internal controls. At the same time, under the proposed plan these functions can be coordinated more effectively, duplications eliminated, and a more efficient service provided. To assure continued effective management of this highly important and technical phase of the Treasury functions, I am placing the Fiscal Service under the supervision of a career official. The plan, therefore, provides that the Fiscal Assistant Secretary will be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with civil-service laws and will perform his duties under the general direction of the Secretary. This is in accord with the policy of this administration of bringing higher administrative positions within the career service. The creation of the office of Fiscal Assistant Secretary will not increase the number of Assistant Secretaries in the Treasury Department since the plan expressly provides for the abolition of one of the three existing offices of Assistant Secretary.

The second reorganization affecting the Treasury Department vests in the Secretary of the Treasury full authority for the administration of the Federal Alcohol Administration Act. At present the Federal Alcohol Administration occupies an anomalous position. It is legally a part of the Treasury Department, but actually it is clothed with almost complete independence under existing statutory provisions. Under certain conditions the administration would by law become an independent agency, whereas the interests of improved management require its integration with allied activities in the Treasury Department.

I propose, therefore, that the functions of the Federal Alcohol Administration be correlated with the activities of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, particularly its Alcohol Tax Unit. The Bureau is already performing a large part of the field enforcement work of the administration and could readily take over complete responsibility for its work. The Bureau is daily making, for other purposes, a majority of the contacts with units of the liquor industry which the Federal Alcohol Administration should but cannot make without the establishment of a large and duplicating field force. Under the provisions of this plan, it will be possible more effectively to utilize the far-flung organization of the Treasury Department, including its many laboratories, in discharging the functions of the Federal Alcohol Administration. Thus, I find the proposed consolidation will remedy deficiencies in organization structure as well as afford a more effective service at materially reduced costs.

Department of the Interior: Reorganization Plan II transferred the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior and thus concentrated in one department the two bureaus responsible for the conservation and utilization of the wildlife resources of the Nation. On the basis of experience gained since this transfer, I find it necessary and desirable to consolidate these units into a single bureau to be known as the Fish and Wildlife Service.

The Bureau of Biological Survey administers Federal laws relating to birds, land mammals, and amphibians, whereas the Bureau of Fisheries deals with fishes, marine mammals, and other aquatic animals. The natural areas of operation of these two Bureaus frequently coincide, and their activities are interrelated and similar in character. Consolidation will eliminate duplication of work, facilitate coordination of programs, and improve service to the public.

Another provision relating to the Department of the Interior is the abolition of the statutory office of Recorder of the General Land Office. This office is a relic of the quill and sand-box period in the transcription of land records. Its duties can readily be absorbed by the regular civil-service personnel of the Land Office.

Department of Agriculture: I propose to consolidate the Division of Marketing and Marketing Agreements of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation into a single agency to be known as the Surplus Marketing Administration. This consolidation will facilitate the work of the Department of Agriculture relating to the formulation and administration of marketing agreements and the disposition of agricultural surpluses.

Because the two programs require unified planning and direction, the Secretary of Agriculture has found it desirable to designate the same person as the head of both. In one capacity he reports directly to the Secretary of Agriculture while in the other he is responsible by law to the Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Consolidation of the two units will assure unified management, eliminate confusion in administration, and make for more efficient operation. Furthermore, this reorganization will remove from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration the legal responsibility for functions which differ administratively from its major operations.

Department of Labor: I propose to abolish the offices of Commissioner of Immigration and the offices of District Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization. The former have been vacant since 1933; the latter impose an unnecessary level of supervision above that of District Director of Immigration and Naturalization in certain of our ports and should be eliminated in the interests of economy and sound administration.

Civil Aeronautics Authority: I propose to clarify the relations of the Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the five-member Board of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. The Administrator is made the chief administrative officer of the Authority with respect to all functions other than those relating to economic regulation and certain other activities primarily of a rule-making and adjudicative character which are entrusted to the Board. This will eliminate the confusion of responsibilities existing under the Civil Aeronautics Act and provide a more clear-cut and effective plan of organization for the agency.

Improvements and savings: The principal advantage of the reorganizations proposed in this plan will be increased effectiveness of operation of the agencies concerned. In addition to improved service some economies may be expected. I estimate that immediate annual savings in administrative expense of approximately $150,000 will result. This comparatively small amount in no way measures the worth of the proposals. In fact, if they resulted in no administrative savings at all, I should still consider them worth while in view of the increased effectiveness of administration that will result.

Need for continuous study: The management problems of a department or agency are complex and dynamic and require much detailed analysis before findings can be made. These problems cannot be resolved by any one reorganization plan, nor at one time; their study must be a continuing process if our departmental machinery is to keep pace with the changing requirements placed on the Government. Accordingly, in conformity with the Budget and Accounting Act, I have instructed the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to continue studies in collaboration with the several departments and agencies, looking to further improvements in the Government's administrative structure.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 2, 1940.

Be it enacted, etc., That, in order to provide for a free and comprehensive review by the legislative branch of the Government of Budget plans and Budget proposals, there is hereby established in the legislative branch of the Government an agency of the Congress to be known as the Congressional Budget Service, which shall be solely and directly responsible to Congress.

The chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees shall be members of this joint committee and shall appoint the remaining members from their respective appropriations committees. (b) Quarters and space sufficient for the functioning of the Congressional Budget Service and its staff shall be provided in the Senate or House Office Buildings or the Capitol Building. Quarters shall also be provided, whenever necessary, in the Bureau of the Budget and the departments and establishments.

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually such sums as may be necessary for the proper execution of this act.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. DAVIS is as follows:

It is the studied opinion of many specialists in the field of Government fiscal affairs that Congress must obtain more complete information as to the Budget and the needs of the spending agencies than the means heretofore available have made possible. For this purpose I am introducing today a bill to establish under the direction of a joint committee on appropriations and the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations a congressional Budget service to act as a liaison unit between the legislative and executive branches of the Government in order to provide some means whereby the Congress can obtain more complete information as to the Budget and the needs of the spending agencies.

We can all agree that the determination of policy is the primary objective of the great bulk of legislation passed by Congress and is fundamental to the governing process in a constitutional government. Yet the majority of students of government today are not so deeply concerned with problems of legislation as with problems of administration. Obviously this is not because the work which Congress has to do is growing simpler. On the contrary, the problems with which Congress has to deal grow more complicated at every session. Nowhere is this fact more apparent than in the field of financial legislation. Nowhere is the ability of Congress to make wise determinations of greater concern to the public. But in spite of the increasing complexity of legislative business and in spite of the inherent difficulties to be overcome in the conduct of business by legislative assemblies, surprisingly little thought has been given to the problem of equipping Congress to discharge its growing responsibilities. I do not wish to belittle the efforts of those whose primary interest is the improvement of administrative techniques. I wish merely to point out that an increase of administrative efficiency will not of itself make the legislative process more effective. For efficient handling of legislative business all agencies of the Government which participate in the legislative process must be equipped to perform effectively their respective functions. The purpose of this bill is to provide some means by which the Federal financial policy can be rendered more effective.

According to the American way of thinking, public borrowing is an expedient adopted to overcome a temporary failure of revenues to meet expenditures. Public policy relating to borrowing has therefore been a byproduct of revenue policy and no distinct method has been evolved by Congress for its determination. The Secretary of the Treasury has usually been given authority within limits adjusted from time to time to borrow all amounts necessary to meet Treasury requirements and to plan all necessary arrangements for both temporary and long-term financing in cooperation with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. Thus present-day financial policy, to the extent that it receives detailed consideration by the legislature, is concerned almost exclusively with issues relating to internal taxes and expenditures.

The means by which policies are determined are different under different forms of government. Under an authoritarian form of government they are determined by means not disclosed to the public and are announced by decree. Under a democratic constitution, policies are determined through open discussion in a representative assembly and become known to the public as they are evolved. Thus the progressive development of a democratic society hangs on the efficacy of its legislative system, both to insure free exercise of democratic rights and to enable the people clearly to identify the problems to be dealt with and to understand the policies evolved by their chosen representatives.

Our Government is becoming more immense every day. It is growing by leaps and bounds. The force of its power seems irresistible. In the executive branch of the Government alone there are 936,000 employees. The Government has entered new fields of activity. More and more demands are being made. No one but those in Congress can appreciate the pressure from all sides to perpetuate this huge machine. The time has come when Congress must know the facts unadulterated by pressure groups and special interests. In the melee of the tremendous burden that has gravitated to Congress, careful consideration of all legislative bills is difficult. In the executive branch of the Government the Chief Executive is provided with an administrative aid in the form of the Bureau of the Budget. It is the purpose of this bill to provide an administrative aid to the Congress. Extravagant public spending needs wise and rigid control. Otherwise waste or inflation may result. Efficiency in government requires an effective and economical administration of the Budget. Democracy in government also requires legislative grip on the public purse strings.

Notwithstanding its dependence on executive officers for the initial formulation, if not continuing guidance in financial legislation, Congress continues to bear full responsibility for the measures enacted into law. As Congress is intended to function as a representative body, enacting only such policies as are understood and approved by the people, it follows that the lack of suitable congressional machinery for obtaining information by which (1) to weigh the various proposals both from within and without the body of Congress and (2) to develop guiding principles intelligible to the public must be regarded as a serious weakness of our legislative process. There is a growing conviction that if Congress is to be as well equipped as the President to discharge its constitutional responsibilities to the people, it must develop an independent method of getting information on which to base its determination of financial policy. By creating an independent congressional agency, we can provide for this necessity. There must be free and comprehensive review in the lawmaking body. At present Congress is not supplied with full and dependable data to make this review. Only a congressional agency can or will supply it. It seems vital that Congress should have its own independent source of fiscal information.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE ARGEEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess yesterday, what is known as the La Follette amendment was the pending question. The Senate entered into a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate on that amendment. The agreement said nothing about the bill, but the Chair has heretofore considered such agreements to apply to the amendment, and not to the bill. There was no agreement as to limitation of debate on amendments to the amendment or on substitutes for the amendment. The Chair wanted that to be understood, so that the Senate would know the parliamentary situation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the 15-minute limitation apply to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and also to any amendment to or substitute for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I did not hear what was said by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it was the intention of everyone yesterday when the debate ended and the Senate adjourned that the 15-minute limitation should be restricted to the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and any amendment to it or substitute for it, the same as in the other case; but the agreement does not restrict debate on the joint resolution itself.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It does not relate to anything except this amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. To no amendment except this particular amendment or a substitute therefor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I rise to support the La Follette amendment. I think there should be two amendments to it, however. In the first place, I believe that in line 1, on page 2, where the amendment constitutes the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce a fact-finding board, there should be inserted, after that clause, the words "or such representatives as they appoint." It was suggested yesterday, in a colloquy between the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from Wisconsin, that it probably would be impossible for the Secretaries named to sit for a month as a fact-finding board; they would have to have the right to appoint representatives.

I think, also, there should be stricken out the last clause, beginning in line 22, to the bottom of the page. As the amendment stands, that clause would make the treaties illegal if it should be found that everyone entitled to a hearing did not have a hearing. The other portions of the amendment provides for granting a hearing to all interested parties; and therefore I think the last five lines of the amendment, stating that the treaties shall be illegal unless all interested parties were given hearings, might make the matter too uncertain. It might raise a question as to the legality of a treaty after it was entered into.

With those suggested changes, I really cannot see why the proponents of the legislation should object to having a fact-finding commission composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce. It is necessary to have a fact-finding commission. The only difference is that under the present law the fact-finding commission consists of persons appointed by the Secretary of State.

We do not know who are the persons whom the Secretary appoints. They may be very able men, or they may be merely ordinary men such as are sometimes found in a department. In any event, if we are to have a fact-finding commission—and the law provides for a fact-finding commission—we ought to have the best fact-finding commission it is possible to obtain. We know who the Secretary of Agriculture is; we know who the Secretary of Commerce is; and we would trust that kind of fact-finding commission. It must be recognized that the fact-finding commission is one of the most important institutions in connection with this whole matter.

I do not think anyone can assume that the Secretary of State, who has so much business to attend to, such a vast amount of diplomatic correspondence and other matters of great importance, can give his personal attention to finding the facts upon which these agreements are to be based. It is impossible. However, even if there were a temporary fact-finding commission made up as it is now, it would be far more satisfactory to the country if the findings of fact could be reviewed by a regular board consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture.

As a matter of fact, the Secretary of Commerce was supposed to know something about commerce until the present act was passed. Now, apparently there is only one person in the Government service who knows anything about foreign commerce. The Secretary of Agriculture is supposed to know something about foreign commerce. A great and important part of his functions is looking for foreign markets for agricultural products. He is authorized to do some very extraordinary things in aid of the export of our agricultural products. Is it not reasonable and practical, when we are dealing with foreign commerce, to have the Agricultural Department and the Department of Commerce represented in the fact-finding body? Of course it is. I do not think anyone here would hesitate to admit that but for the fact that argument now is a waste of the time of the proponents of this legislation. I realize that. The taste of blood by all animals makes them vicious beyond reason. It is perfectly natural.

The greatest complaint that has been made with regard to the procedure under the Trade Agreements Act has been that no reasonable hearing before the present advisory board is provided for. We know that. I do not have to argue that. There is not a Member of this body who has had any representations to make to the present fact-finding commission with regard to his constituents who does not realize that he had no hearing.

I assume that all of us have had to present some matter to the present fact-finding body on behalf of some of our constituents. We never knew whether or not the present body heard it. We never knew, if they heard it, whether or not they understood it. We never knew whether they agreed with us or disagreed with us. That kind of a trial would be very unsatisfactory to most lawyers in this body; yet this measure is so perfect that there cannot be a change in an "i" or a "t" in it. Why should there be a change in it? We are looking for expedition in this country. We do not want to wait a year or two to decide what the taxes of the people shall be—not at all. We want it done in a month. Expedition is the thing now. To have a board composed of the heads or representatives of different departments of the Government who also have an interest in foreign trade would possibly delay the consideration of very important items of tariff; and it is far more important that we be hasty in the matter than that we be right. That is the whole theory of this legislation.

I often wonder why the framers of our Constitution made the terrible mistake of having revenue legislation originate in the House of Representatives. They must have known that the consideration of such legislation by a large body of that kind would require long delay. Why could not the framers of the Constitution even then have turned over that function to the President of the United States, and said, "Write out a tariff bill. Write out a tariff bill of 3,000 items. You can dictate it in 1 month." That is all right. That is the proper way to do these things. But since haste is so popular in this body, since haste is succeeding so well in this body, why yield to anything? No. "We have them licked; tear them to pieces. This is no time to reason or think. This is the time to act. Let us be expeditious."

This is a plain little proposition to have the other two departments of the Government which have imposed on them duties and functions with regard to our exports made a part of the board to determine the facts bearing on these treaties. I know, however, there is no use in saying any more. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not think it is fair to say that the sole object of the proposed legislation is haste. Some gentlemen who are very much disappointed may think that is the only object, but it is not. The object is to carry out a very wise program, to which it seems most of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle object. They think they have a better plan. We will see. Perhaps in the course of 20 years or so, if the fortunes of politics change, they will present their plan. The history of the Republican Party shows what their plan is and what their plan has been as evidenced by the last tariff bill proposed by them, and which, as I stated in my opening remarks, played a very influential part in bringing on the economic debacle in this country.

We are merely trying to go along in an orderly way, with full opportunity for argument and for the presentation of amendments, and because no one is flushed with victory, we hope that this legislation will not be destroyed, and that we can hold our lines. But we are working against very great obstacles, because the Republican Party is pretty much buoyed and has been holding its lines pretty well, and I suppose will continue to do so; and there seem to be some gentlemen on this side who are playing the game with them.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I never charged the leadership on this side with playing with the Republican side during the consideration of the Hatch bill. I do not make that kind of insinuations.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator from Nevada may not have made the statement, but it was made quite frequently on this side of the aisle.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Nevada protects his own reputation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, getting back to the subject before us, we are proceeding along in an orderly way, trying to extend legislation which has been and I hope will continue to be of benefit to the country. Some of us think conscientiously that the program we have presented is the best one to follow; others on this side, and those on the other side, I assume, conscientiously believe that it is wiser to follow some other procedure. But we have very high authority, even from Republicans, that, under this program, the Committee on Reciprocity Information and the Interdepartmental Committee, in negotiating agreements, have been very fair. They have given opportunity to people to be heard. I admit, and I stated in the hearings, even to the Secretary of State, as I recall in 1937, that there might be improvement in the matter of public hearing by the gentlemen who are negotiating agreements. I am delighted at the progress made in that respect.

What is it we are called on to decide now? We are called on by the La Follette amendment to change the present method of procedure, and to create a board. I think the criticism of the Senator from Nevada that there should be provision for some substitute if a Cabinet member cannot sit on the board, so far as it goes, is a very just criticism, because no one can expect the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of Commerce, to sit all the time as a board to hear the various witnesses. Many matters might arise which would preclude them from being in attendance. But the existing plan is a very good one.

It was stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] in his opening argument that of course when we get ready to negotiate with a country there are some preliminary conversations. Of course, experts have to study what should be the subject matter of the negotiations and what concessions can be considered mutually in order to be beneficial to each side. So preliminary conversations take place. Following that, an announcement is made of the intention to negotiate an agreement with a certain country and the list of items or commodities to be considered for concessions is made public for the information of all interested parties. An opportunity is afforded all interested persons to testify or to submit briefs to the Committee for Reciprocity Information.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I notice that by section 4 of the proposed amendment the board is to be composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce. Would that not be wholly unavailing, in practice, at least, because all these Secretaries are members of the President's Cabinet, and the power that is given by the bill is to the President? If the President wanted a certain thing, is it to be supposed that his Secretary of Agriculture and his Secretary of Commerce would take issue with his findings, as made up by the Secretary of State? Would not this amendment merely introduce confusion rather than orderly procedure?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to point out that the amendment would not prevent the same procedure being followed in the future that has been followed in the past with regard to testimony on general information and topics which have been listed for consideration in the negotiations. The principal point of the amendment is to give interested citizens an opportunity to be heard after they know what the specific terms of the agreement are, what it contains, prior to the time when it is finally put into effect.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield; but I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Wisconsin misapprehends the point to which the Senator from Texas alluded. I am alluding to the inclusion of the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Agriculture. If I were President of the United States—which, of course I will never be—and one of my Cabinet who was a member of a board should take action contrary to my views and advice, he would not be in the Cabinet more than a minute and a half. I would kick him out, as the Senator from Wisconsin would. So what is the use putting three Cabinet members on the board when one will do? Three and one—three for the price of one. [Laughter.] I thank the Senator from Mississippi for yielding.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not care to take any further time of the Senator from Mississippi, but representatives of these Departments are now on the Committee on Reciprocity Information.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I thought that the amendment offered by the Senator was one which was carrying out the suggestions of the Farm Bureau Federation, namely, that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce should approve all the agreements made. But this is quite a different question from that. This is a question of changing the whole procedure with reference to public hearings. The Senator provides that these gentlemen must conduct the hearings. The witnesses could return after they had formulated an agreement, and the Senator provides, too, that if there has been failure to give notice to anyone, the question may be reopened, and so on.

As has been pointed out by the Senator himself, the Department of Agriculture is now represented on the Committee for Reciprocity Information, as well as the Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee, and the same gentlemen carry on the negotiations. I do not suppose there is a detail about which the Secretary of Agriculture is not advised by his representatives, because no doubt he chooses the very best man he can find. The Tariff Commission is certainly in a strong position to know what a particular rate should be, and on what articles concessions might be made, and to study the questions involved from a highly technical point of view, and that Commission is represented upon the Committee for Reciprocity Information and the Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee.

The criticism at first made has been met, as has been evidenced by Mr. Monro, the president of the American Tariff League, and one of the most influential among those opposed to this whole program. I quoted a few days ago from his statement before the committee. He said in his annual report for 1938:

> I will also stress the fact that in carrying out the trade-agreements policy by Mr. Hull great credit should be given to the fact that there has been no suspicion of political influence regarding the reduction of duties on any of the articles placed on the reciprocal-trade list. I believe that everyone who has had occasion to contact the staff that makes up the schedules must admit that, regardless of whether we approve of the policy or not, the agreements were prepared solely with a viewpoint of endeavoring to increase foreign trade with the least injury to domestic production.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not charged, and I do not hold in my mind any charge, that there has been any political manipulation; but the Senator cannot get away from the fact that under the present procedure all that an interested person has an opportunity to do is to testify after he has been notified that certain commodities may be the subject of negotiation. My amendment—and this is its main point—provides an opportunity to interested persons to be heard after they know what the proposed changes in tariff rates are to be.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; after the closest and most minute study, and after the two sides have been able to agree, through an exchange of conversations, and to get together on some rates, then they would be published to the whole world, and the pressure of selfish and interested groups would be here holding the agreements up as far as possible, and engaging in the kind of propaganda, I might call it, we have seen so rampant during the writing of every tariff bill. If this amendment should prevail it would result in a continual harassing of the negotiation of any reciprocal-trade agreement. I think the present procedure is entirely proper and satisfactory, and I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to reiterate, and, if I can, emphasize what the Senator from Mississippi has said about the amendment. What does the amendment provide? It provides, first, that before any trade agreement shall be concluded with any foreign country, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government shall be given. That is the first step under the amendment. As soon as the State Department or the President decides to negotiate one of these agreements with any country, under the terms of the amendment the President must give notice that he is contemplating an agreement with some country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the language of section 4 of the existing law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that, and I am coming to the further language in the Senator's amendment. The President must give notice. That is provided for by the present law. Notice shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to a board composed of the three Secretaries named. Before any negotiations have been entered into, but immediately upon notice being given by the President that he plans to negotiate with some country concerning an agreement, everyone who thinks he has an interest in the terms of the agreement has a right to come before the board composed of the three Secretaries.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. That notice, as I understand, contains a specification of the particular items which will be subject to negotiation.

Mr. BARKLEY. The way it is done now, when notice is given to the public of the contemplation of negotiating a treaty, a list is given of all the possible items that might be considered. All those items may not enter into the agreement, but a list of items which possibly may enter into the agreement is given, so that everyone interested in those items may have notice with respect to them.

As has been stated here, it would be physically impossible for the three Secretaries to devote themselves as a board to sitting and listening to the witnesses. The result would be that some subordinate somewhere down the line would be designated from the three Departments to hold the hearings.

The President is prohibited by the language of the amendment from entering into any negotiations with any government until the Board has reported its recommendation. In other words, the President must sit idly by until three subordinates—and no one knows how far down the line they might be—hold a hearing and make a recommendation to the President, through their superior officer, the member of the Cabinet.

If we can assume that all three of these men would agree, and that the three Cabinet members would also agree on what their subordinates had found and recommended, then they would recommend to the President of the United States what should be done with respect to all these items concerning which notice had been given that they might be considered.

Up to that time there have been no negotiations, but there would be public hearings, and the recommendation, if it had any influence on the President, would absolutely take away from him any negotiating power, because every country with which he proposes to negotiate an agreement would know in advance what the recommendation of the subordinate committee had been or would be, and if it had any influence over him or any moral obligation upon him, he would be limited in his negotiations to the recommendations of the Board.

After the Board has made its recommendations to the President, under the provisions of the amendment, if the President concluded to undertake an agreement based upon its recommendation, then the matter must go before the Board again, and a further notice must be given, with the text of the proposed agreement set out in the notice, so that everyone who objects to it may again go before the Board and make protest against the recommendations of the Board previously made. So there we have two hearings at least before the same Board.

Then the amendment provides that after the agreement has been tentatively entered into there cannot be any change in any of the items or any of its terms if anyone contends that he has not been given an opportunity to appear before the Board and be heard.

I realize the good faith of the Senator from Wisconsin; he knows how greatly I appreciate his good faith and sincerity in anything he does here; and I am sure he has not offered the amendment for the purpose of hamstringing the President; but the effect of it is to do so, because it would always make necessary at least two hearings before the Board—one preliminary, and then one after the agreement had been entered into tentatively between the two governments, and then another hearing before the same Board to give anyone a chance to protest again against provisions of the agreement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I know his time is limited.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does not the Senator realize that there is a very great difference between an opportunity to be heard on a general subject which may be taken into a negotiation and giving general testimony concerning what effects the rate changes may have upon a commodity, and having an opportunity to be heard upon a proposed specific change in a rate?

Mr. President, it would be just like the Finance Committee, when it had a tariff bill under consideration, announcing to the country that the entire tariff was open to revision, but that the committee would refuse to reveal the terms of the bill; that interested citizens could come in and be heard, but that after the testimony was concluded they were never to know what the terms of the bill were or what rates were provided until after it became law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I realize the difference between a general hearing and a hearing on some specific items. But under the preliminary notice given under the Senator's amendment that a conference is going to be had with some country about an agreement——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That provision is in the existing law. I have not tried to change it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that. I am not contending that the Senator is trying to change it. It is my contention that the present treaty is adequate and affords to all persons in the United States all the opportunity they have any reasonable right to demand in order that their wishes may be presented to the Department before a final negotiation has been consummated. But the point I am making is that all persons are invited to come before the Board, constituted of subordinates in the three Departments—and that is what it will be—to make general objection.

Someone who is interested in some item may say to that Board, "We object to any reduction of tariff on this item." That objection will be considered. Then the recommendation is made to the President as to whether there shall be a reduction. Then the President goes ahead and negotiates an agreement.

Suppose the tariff is reduced on some item against which there has already been a protest in the preliminary hearing. Those who object have a right, under the Senator's amendment, to go before the Board again and protest against the reduction or change in the tariff on that item against which they have already protested. In the meantime everything is held up by these two hearings. There might be even more hearings, because if someone should claim that he had not had an opportunity to be heard the President would still be unable to go forward and act until there had been another hearing to give someone else an opportunity to protest.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield. However, my time is limited.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All I wish to point out, Mr. President, is the right of any person to be heard, as now provided in section 4, and there has been no difficulty in limiting the hearings to a reasonable compass any more than there is before a committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that, and I agree that they have the right to be heard now, and they are being heard now. They are all heard, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has said, more adequately probably than they were heard at the beginning. The Senator's amendment proposes a hearing by subordinates. But the point I make is that there is no way to avoid at least two hearings, one before the treaty is made and one after it has been agreed to, before it can take effect, during which time the President is absolutely helpless to do anything except to wait until there is a second report made to him by the same board which the Senator's amendment sets up.

In view of the confusion and the delay and the unnecessary complication involved in that sort of a process, it seems to me unwise to adopt the Senator's amendment. I believe the State Department has tried in all good conscience to work out a plan by which everyone is given a fair and free opportunity to be heard. As the Senator from Texas a moment ago suggested, if these Cabinet members are going to do what the President wants them to do, then it is useless to go through the process or the farce of holding a hearing. If they are not going to do what the President wants them to do, then there is a controversy between three Cabinet members, growing out of the investigations of their subordinates, and the President has to do what should be done with respect to these agreements. From any of these standpoints it seems to me unwise to complicate the situation by adopting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement. In the first place, I modify my amendment on page 2, line 1, after the word "Commerce", to insert "or their duly authorized representatives."

Mr. President, under the existing law it is provided in section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President—

Down to that point my amendment is precisely in conformity with section 4 of the existing law—or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe; and before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

Mr. President, my amendment would not interfere with the procedure in the existing law, except that it specifically designates the persons, or their duly authorized representatives, who are to hold the hearings. In every other respect it is precisely the same as the existing law.

In the second place, the amendment, as I view it, would not in anywise curtail the ultimate power of the Executive to enter into trade agreements, but it would do what it seems to me we should provide in the law, and that is to give interested citizens an opportunity to be heard upon the specific terms of an agreement before the negotiated agreement goes into effect.

It is all well and good for Senators to rise and say that interested persons are notified of the projected negotiation of a trade treaty; that they are notified of subjects or commodities which may be taken into consideration in the negotiations; and that they may come before such a body as the President may designate and present their views upon the advisability of a particular commodity or group of commodities being included in the negotiations; but once that hearing is over interested citizens have no opportunity to know what specific changes in rates are proposed in a trade agreement until the agreement has become the law of the land. I say, Mr. President, that that is not a democratic procedure. I say that we ought to provide, as we do in connection with a piece of proposed legislation, that interested persons shall have an opportunity to come forward and give specific and definite testimony upon a specific and definite proposed legislative change.

As suggested a few moments ago, what would be the reaction in this country if the Ways and Means Committee of the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate should decline to reveal any proposed legislative changes in a tariff measure and should afford to interested citizens and parties only the opportunity to appear and discuss whether or not any changes should be considered by the committee? Such a policy would be denounced as a star-chamber proceeding. I think every person realizes the difference between an individual or representative of a corporation being confronted with such a situation that he can discuss only in general terms whether there should be a reduction or an increase of the duty on an item or commodity in which he is interested and being given an opportunity to give testimony and present arguments upon specific proposed changes.

Mr. President, it has been said that this amendment would cause some delay. I do not believe there is any ground for fear that the hearing would be unnecessarily and purposely prolonged, because such a condition has not been evidenced in any of the hearings which have been held up to the present time.

The provisions with regard to the second hearing which I am urging would be the same as those which prevail concerning the hearings which are now held. There has been no effort to bring unnecessary witnesses before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, or to develop a filibuster by bringing on witness after witness to give repetitious testimony; and there will be no such situation if the amendment is enacted into law. We are confronted with the same problem in every hearing before every committee of Congress. We must regulate and govern the conduct of hearings. Such power is inherent in the amendment.

Mr. President, I really do not see how any Senator could vote against the amendment, regardless of his attitude upon this important question, because, as previously stated, all the amendment seeks to do is to give the people of the country an opportunity to be heard upon proposed legislative changes which are to be incorporated in a reciprocal-trade agreement. I think every Senator who is familiar with the situation recognizes that it is important to afford such an opportunity. The proposal is so simple that it speaks for itself. The issue is simply this: When a reciprocal-trade agreement is to be negotiated in the future, are citizens who are vitally interested in the proposed changes to be contained in such an agreement to have an opportunity to be heard upon the specific terms of the agreement before the agreement is promulgated and the statute law of the land amended?

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. I have difficulty in understanding the import of the last paragraph of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I can explain it very briefly to the Senator. All that provision proposes to do is to provide that if, after the hearing has been held upon a proposed trade agreement, with its terms known to the interested parties who appear before the tribunal, any specific charge is to be made in it, they shall subsequently be given an opportunity to be heard upon the proposed change.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Gladly.

Mr. GILLETTE. As I understand that provision, after the hearing is had, as provided in subsection (b), the board will report to the President recommending certain changes. The final language in the paragraph provides that such changes shall not be made unless every person interested shall have had an opportunity to be heard. My question is, Does that language go further and provide that there shall be no affirmation of the preceding rates and provisions unless interested parties shall have an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No. I think the language is clear in that respect. I discussed that matter; but if the Senator has any doubt on the question, I am willing to modify the amendment by striking out that language. As I said in response to the Senator's inquiry, all it proposes to do is to provide, for example, that after a particular proposed trade agreement has been made public, hearings have been held upon it, and interested parties have been given an opportunity to be heard, if there is to be a change in the proposed agreement prior to the time it is finally entered into, interested parties shall be given a like opportunity to be heard upon the proposed change. However, if the Senator feels any doubt about the wisdom of that provision, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to modify the amendment by eliminating it. The principal thing with which I am concerned is to give citizens who are vitally interested in the trade agreements an opportunity to be heard upon specific proposed changes which are to be incorporated in such agreements.

Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I further modify my amendment by inserting a period after the word "advisable," in line 22, on page 2, and striking out the remainder of the page.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as modified. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. In view of the fact that the amendment has not been stated since the last modification, the Chair thinks it should be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. Section 4 of such act of June 12, 1934, as amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. (a) Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to a Board composed of the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, or their duly authorized representatives, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. The Board shall report to the President as soon as practicable its recommendations with respect to such agreement and such agreement shall not be concluded until such report is made. Before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

"(b) No such proposed agreement shall take effect until public hearings have been held by the Board with respect thereto and an opportunity afforded to all interested persons to present their views with respect to any matter contained therein, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. Notice of such hearings shall be published in the Federal Register not less than 30 days before such hearings are to commence and such notice shall contain the complete text of such proposed agreement. The Board shall report to the President as soon as practicable its recommendations with respect to any change in such proposed agreement that the Board may deem advisable."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], as modified, which has just been read. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LUCAS (when Mr. SLATTERY's name was called). My colleague, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], is unavoidably detained from the Chamber on public business. It is my understanding that he has a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. If the Senator from Illinois were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay"; and the Senator from New Jersey, if present and permitted to vote, would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRIDGES. On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. If the Senator from Ohio were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea"; and the Senator from Utah, if present, would vote "nay." I vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent because of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], as already announced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] are necessarily absent.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] is detained in a conference at the White House.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are detained in various Government departments.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN]. I am advised that if present and voting the Senator from California and the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea" and that the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

Mr. KING. Upon this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], who is detained on public business, and permit my vote to stand.

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, yesterday I submitted an amendment containing a reference to agricultural products. My amendment defined agricultural products as being any article which on the date of enactment of House Joint Resolution 407 is classified as an agricultural import in the schedule of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce, designated as "Schedule A, Statistical Classification of Imports Into the United States."

I present herewith, for the guidance of the Senate, a list of commodities, items, and articles which are classified by schedule A as agricultural products. I ask to have this list printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Horses, cattle, sheep, goats, hogs, poultry—all classes (except for breeding).

All edible meat products, including fresh, chilled, or frozen beef, veal, pork, mutton, lamb, goat meat, reindeer meat, venison, birds (including poultry), canned beef (including corned beef), pickled meat, lard, oleo oil, oleo stearin, tallow, oleomargarine, milk and cream, butter, cheese, cheddar, eggs, gelatin, hides and skins (except furs), sheep and lamb skins, animal and fish oils, fats and grease, hoofs and horns, bones, feathers, animal wax, tankage.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, and that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 9 to the bill and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I call up the amendment, which is on the desk, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the end of the joint resolution, the following new section:

SEC. 2. No foreign-trade agreement hereafter entered into under the authority delegated to the President by such section 350, as amended, no amendatory or supplementary agreement hereafter entered into under such section, and no duties and other import restrictions specified in a proclamation issued by the President to carry out any such foreign-trade agreement or any such amendatory or supplementary agreement, shall take effect until the Congress by law has specifically approved such agreement and the duties and other import restrictions so specified to carry out such agreement.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, first I desire to express my appreciation of the generous manner in which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the chairman of the Finance Committee, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the majority leader, have endeavored to conduct this debate. Their consideration of those of us who have offered amendments, and who still desire to offer amendments, and who wish to have those amendments fully discussed, must be obvious to all; and I express my gratitude for that consideration.

Let me say that I should not now offer the amendment which has just been read from the desk if it were not for a profound conviction that it embodies the principle which the Government of the United States should adopt. That this country and the whole world are at a crossroads, that we are in one of those periods of deep-seated readjustment which occur perhaps every 500 years in the history of civilization, it seems to me must be obvious to anyone who looks about him in the world.

There has been considerable confusion of thought upon the issue which is presented here. I do not intend today to traverse again the road which has already been traveled in the constitutional argument; but I do desire to illuminate if I can, to the best of my ability, the issues which are here presented.

TWO GENERAL ISSUES PRESENTED

This question divides itself into two general propositions. The first of these has to do with the desirability of reciprocity as a means of developing world trade. The second issue has to do with the degree of participation which shall be allowed to the Congress in drafting and approving the treaties or agreements embodying reciprocity arrangements, whatever they may be called.

When the amendment of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] was offered, providing for Senate ratification, upon the theory that the agreements are in fact treaties and should under the Constitution be ratified by the Senate, one phase of the constitutional argument was disposed of. By a very narrow vote the Senate decided that it did not want to consider the agreements as treaties. That vote, however, did not dispose of the question of the degree to which congressional participation in the approval of the agreements shall be allowed. It was, as I understand, merely a declaration of opinion by a small majority of the Senate that one more than one-third of the Members of the Senate should not be permitted to prevent the accomplishment of reciprocity in any particular agreement.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator made a comment as to the consequences of the rejection of the Pittman amendment. I am wondering if he has not overstated the consequences. My own idea is that if the agreements are treaties, nothing that Congress can do can obviate the necessity of their ratification by the Senate under the Constitution; and the fact that the Senate might be unwilling to undertake the duty of ratification would not validate the treaties without the two-thirds vote.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is quite correct. If, by anything I said, I gave the impression that I believed the Senate, by its vote against the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, had decided in any valid and effective way that these agreements are not treaties, I certainly hasten to correct that impression now, and I express my gratitude to the Senator for calling attention to the misunderstanding.

Mr. ADAMS. If they are treaties, there is not a single valid reciprocity agreement in existence.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I want it understood that I am not abandoning the arguments made by the Senators from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. MCCARRAN], by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], and by myself in the consideration of the Pittman amendment. To my mind, those arguments still remain completely unanswered. I am merely saying that the Senate, by its vote against the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, had decided that it did not want to permit one more than one-third of the Senate to block reciprocal-trade agreements which might be made by the Secretary of State from becoming effective.

DIFFERENT FROM PITTMAN AMENDMENT

The amendment which I now offer is not open to the principal objection which was made against the Pittman amendment by those who are supporting this program. This amendment calls for affirmative action by both Houses of Congress to approve every trade agreement. It requires that the agreements, before they can become effective, shall be submitted to Congress and shall be approved by Congress.

I want it clearly understood that this amendment is altogether different from the Pittman amendment. The Pittman amendment would have required a two-thirds vote of the Senate to approve a trade agreement. This amendment requires merely a majority vote in both Houses of Congress.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMATHERS. Does the distinguished Senator from Wyoming really believe that the House and the Senate would ever get around to the job of actually ratifying these agreements?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that ratification is no longer a question as a matter of reality, but I do believe that the intelligence and the good sense of the people's representatives assembled in Congress is such that if a reciprocity agreement is for the benefit of the people of the United States we need not fear the action of Congress upon such an agreement. I think a Congress which is willing to give away its power to pass upon these agreements in order that the head of an executive department may carry them out and make them effective would not be unwilling, when the same official came before the Congress and demonstrated that he had made a good agreement, to approve it.

Mr. SMATHERS. Will the Senator yield for one other question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. Does the Senator know that President McKinley negotiated eight reciprocal trade agreements which are still awaiting Senate ratification?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wonder whether the Senator is correct about that. The Senator obviously has not understood my argument. He is talking about treaties. That argument was settled a few days ago when the Pittman amendment was voted down. It might be that there were the Kasson treaties and other treaties which required a two-thirds vote which were not ratified. The Senator is talking about a battle that was fought and, for his side, won almost a week ago. I am talking about another issue. I am talking about the power of the people's representatives, in Congress assembled, to act upon a revenue-raising measure, to act upon a measure which fixes customs duties to be paid by consumers who live in the State of New Jersey, in the State of Colorado, in the State of Michigan, in every State of the Union. The Senator from New Jersey is willing to give away his power to review the duties and tariffs which must be paid by his people, but I, speaking for the citizens of Wyoming, am not willing to surrender what I conceive to be my constitutional duty.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator from Wyoming was still talking about the Pittman amendment, because he was contending—and that prompted my question—that the arguments which were advanced for the Pittman amendment still held good.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course I contend that the arguments still hold good. As the Senator from Colorado has well said, a majority vote of the Senate of the United States does not make a treaty something else. I believe that the vote a few days ago was a mistaken vote, but I am trying to say to the Senate that I am not here today discussing the Pittman amendment, or the question of ratification. I am today discussing an issue which, it seems to me, is much more important, because it has to do, not only with the right, the responsibility, and the duty of the elected representatives of the people to know in advance what tariffs are to be paid by the citizens, the consumers in the United States of America, but also with the fundamentals of democratic government.

As I was saying, it is not my purpose to review the constitutional argument. Let me mention only the fact that when we contended that these agreements were treaties the answer by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] was that they are not treaties but are laws. My own opinion always was that when in an agreement the provisions of a treaty are changed, the agreement necessarily becomes a treaty, and that because they change customs duties they are also laws. But let us now regard them as laws only, and see what confronts us when we consider our responsibility in that field.

TWO-YEAR TERM OF REPRESENTATION

The framers of the Constitution of the United States were very careful to provide that Members of the House of Representatives should be elected every 2 years. They were also careful to provide that to the House of Representatives should be committed the duty of originating revenue bills. The purpose of fixing the 2-year term of Members of the House of Representatives and the reason for providing that revenue measures should originate in the House was that the founders of this Republic held a conviction that the most numerous branch of the legislature should be close to the people, that it should be frequently chosen by the people, in order that it might be completely responsive to their will, and the reason for the 2-year term for Members of the House of Representatives was that the founders of this Government believed so profoundly in the doctrine of popular sovereignty, of popular government, of free institutions, and they did not want to allow the taxing power in any of its forms to pass out of the hands of those representatives of the people who were closest to the people. So I say that in considering the amendment now before the Senate we are discussing an altogether different proposition from that which was presented under the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

It is not my intention to go over the constitutional argument again. We all know that issue lies in the degree of delegation of legislative authority which is granted. We all know that the question constitutionally is whether or not a sufficient standard, a sufficiently intelligible principle to guide the discretion of the Executive, is laid down in the measure before us. I presume that it will now be impossible to change any minds or any votes upon that phase of the argument, so it will not be my intention to pursue the subject. However, I wish to discuss two primary phases of this subject, and I hope I can do so without unduly trespassing on the Senate's time.

Let me say, first of all, that I believe from the very bottom of my heart that our most precious possession in the United States of America is the democratic principle, that is to say, the principle of popular government. It seems to me that every Member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives who has taken an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States must agree that our greatest duty is to maintain and defend the democratic principle, certainly at a time when it seems to be under attack all over the world. Our most difficult task is undoubtedly to know how to preserve and defend the democratic principle in a world which is almost upon the verge of chaos.

We see democracy almost vanishing from the face of the earth, and mark my words, Senators, we are today determining how we shall maintain democracy. This is the last citadel in the world for the effective defense of the democratic principle. We are confronted with the problem of how to defend it in a world which apparently is about to be involved in another completely enveloping world war.

RECIPROCITY IN A WORLD AT WAR

Mr. President, let me for a moment discuss the first issue, the desirability of reciprocity. I fear that many Members of the Congress and many other citizens have been misled in this debate by their belief that world trade is a good thing, and that, somehow or other, those of us who have been urging the necessity of some form of congressional approval of these agreements are against world trade. Let me say that I desire to dissociate myself completely from that point of view. I recognize, and I think that every sane person who has studied the development of civilization must know, that much of human progress has been largely the result of international commerce. The New World was discovered by a navigator who was seeking out a new route for world trade. All of those who sailed the Atlantic Ocean in the fifteenth century were seeking new trade routes and new commodities. But can we say that there has not been a great change in the modern world?

This we all know, that the foreign commerce of the United States does not amount to more than 10 percent of our total. Not even those who support the reciprocal-trade program, without regard to constitutional limitations or inhibitions, claim that the foreign commerce of the United States amounts to more than 10 percent of our whole trade. But there is another phase of this question which certainly must be dawning on us now. By reason of technological improvements, by reason of the development of science, the world is no longer seeking new commodities; the world is now endeavoring to discover how to distribute the commodities which have already been discovered or produced, or which we are capable of producing.

Until the last quarter of a century the whole aspect of world commerce was the search for commodities in other lands which the country carrying on the search did not possess of itself. We have been sitting here in the Senate and in the House considering the unemployment problem, considering the depression, considering every phase of the economic problem, and if we know anything at all about the significance of the events since 1929 we must realize that our task is how to distribute too much cotton, how to get rid of too much wheat, how to sell too much oil, and how to dispose of all the innumerable and unimagined resources of the world among our own people, so that the producers may operate at a profit.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator's statements are absolutely true. I look at the problem in a little different way than the Senator does. I think the problem is to increase the consumptive power, the ability of people to buy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was just about to say that, Mr. President. That is true.

Mr. BROWN. I am sorry I interfered with the Senator's chain of thought. I think that is the real problem.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator did not interfere with my train of thought at all. He simply collaborated with me in bringing it out. Of course the problem is just as the Senator said, to increase the consuming power of the masses of the people of America.

Mr. BROWN. Then, we can get some good out of this productive power to which the Senator is addressing himself.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Absolutely. So I ask the Senator, since he and I agree upon that diagnosis of our economic ills, can it be said that it is altogether wise, when our own people are unable to buy the commodities which we produce in abundance, that we shall delegate to an executive arm of the Government our complete power, to try to bring in some of the commodities from the Old World, as though we were still living in the era out of which we have come?

NEW ASPECTS OF WORLD TRADE

Mr. President, I do not propose at this moment to render my judgment, and I am not ready to render my judgment upon that profound question. But I say that Senators who vote against retaining for the Congress the power to pass upon these trade agreements when they are made are rendering their judgment. They are saying that they are willing to commit to appointive officers of the Government, the complete power to swap the commodities of the New World for commodities in the Old World which we may not need.

Mr. President, I was very grateful to the Secretary of State when he broke off the negotiations with Argentina. My concern about the proposed agreement with Argentina was not because, as was said so sarcastically, that a few cans of meat might come in. Not at all. My concern about the agreement proposed with Argentina was this: the commodities of Argentina are exactly the same as the commodities of the great West. We were not entering into negotiations to exchange things which we had for things which we did not have. The proposal there was to cut down our own market and to admit the competitive commodities of another nation, which is almost identical in its agricultural aspects, with our own.

It is to the credit of the Secretary of State that he declined to accept the terms which were required by the Government of Argentina.

But the situation presented there clearly defines the issue of world trade at large. When we vote to give complete authority to the Department of State we are entrusting the commercial and economic life of our own people to the decision, not of elective, but of appointive officers. True, that discretion was exercised correctly and well by the Secretary of State in the case of Argentina.

Mr. President, that is not the question. Who will be the Secretary of State 6 months from now? Who will sit there in the Department of State with this power which we today are surrendering? Bear in mind that the Constitution of the United States says that Members of the House shall be elected every 2 years, and that by this joint resolution we propose to grant a 3-year authority to an unknown Secretary of State, surrounded by unknown appointive officers, and we are saying by our votes, "Mr. Unknown Secretary of State, you shall have the power to bind the Government of this country morally for 3 years. You shall have the power to foreclose the constitutional right of those who are elected to the House of Representatives next November to pass upon the customs duties which are to be put into effect by the Department of State."

Mr. President, is that not a situation which must give us pause? In a world in which the democratic principle is at stake are we to believe that it is wise to strip the Congress, the elective body, of this power? Let no one say that I seek to invoke embargoes or economic isolation. That also might be unwise, Mr. President. That also might wreck every effort at recovery. But the power to place an embargo upon the commodities of the United States is contained in the joint resolution, because the rates may be jacked up as well as cut down. We are surrendering complete power within that limitation of 50 percent to change the rates either up or down.

Perhaps the world should never adopt a program of economic isolation. But, Mr. President, shall we blind our eyes to the conditions in Europe? The war between the Allies and Germany has been going on now for many months. The Germans are sitting quietly behind the Siegfried Line, and are constantly boasting to the world that they can continue to sit there. They tell us that they are independent of the economic blockade. They tell us that they can sit there behind that line and wait for the Allies to throw manpower away in a devastating and bloody assault, because, by reason of their development of economic self-sufficiency, they can sit and wait.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I wanted to make an observation upon a subject which the Senator was discussing a moment ago before he referred to the situation abroad. I think the Senator from Wyoming makes an excellent point when he calls attention to the possibility that in another 6 months or in another year we may have a different Secretary of State. I think perhaps, fundamentally, the Senator from Wyoming and I differ.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I hope that fundamentally we do not differ. In the little colloquy we had a moment ago it was perfectly apparent that we were in complete agreement.

Mr. BROWN. That is very true, but I am strongly in favor of the Hull program. I wish to point out that with a different Secretary of State a year from now—possibly a Republican Secretary of State—every one of the treaties or agreements which has been entered into by Secretary Hull may be abrogated.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator makes that argument, he is again in complete agreement with me; and he has just now uttered a sentiment which it seems to me is a perfectly compelling argument in favor of the amendment which I have proposed, because if the Congress to be elected in November 1940 is to be able to overthrow or reject any agreement, how can it do so—unless my amendment shall be adopted—except by passing a bill which would require a two-thirds vote to be passed over the veto of the President?

So now, Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan places himself upon the other horn of the dilemma. He was one of those who voted against the Pittman amendment because, forsooth, it would require two-thirds of the Senate to ratify a treaty; and he now offers me the consolation that two-thirds of the Senate and the House can repeal a trade agreement over the President's veto.

Mr. BROWN. I shall not take the time of the Senate, or of the Senator——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have all the time there is. Let the Senator continue.

Mr. BROWN. I do not wish to discuss my opposition to the Pittman amendment. I very firmly believe that trade agreements are not treaties; but I should be much better disposed toward the Senator's amendment if it were a complete amendment. I think it goes to only one side of this controversy; that is, the matter of congressional approval of the making of a treaty. If we are to adopt that principle I think there should also be congressional approval of the abrogation of a treaty. I think that stability in tariff rates is almost as important as justice in tariff rates.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, again I find myself in agreement with the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. I told the Senator when he was before the Finance Committee that his amendment would certainly receive much more favorable consideration from me if it should provide that no treaty should be abrogated without the consent of the House and Senate by a majority vote.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I shall rewrite the amendment to do just that thing if by so doing I can induce the Senator from Michigan to vote for the principle which he so eloquently announces.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator for that statement, and I certainly should be very much inclined to go along with the Senator if that principle were contained in his amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if I can make my voice heard, I now call upon the Legislative Drafting Service—and I ask that my message be conveyed to them by telephone—to come in and help us to add to this amendment a perfecting change which will adopt the principle announced by the Senator from Michigan, because I am ready to accept it.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator will recall that when I appeared before the Finance Committee and the Senator raised this question, I said that I hoped the Senator would see fit to make that perfection in the committee.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator for his acceptance of my suggestion. I shall not now pledge myself necessarily to be with him, but I am listening very carefully to what the Senator from Wyoming is saying. My mind is not entirely made up on the subject. I think the Secretary of State is very short-sighted when he does not come before an appropriate committee of the Congress and favor a proposal by which his trade treaties could be made at least semipermanent. In my judgment, the situation which faces American industry is a precarious one when we have a tariff policy which can be utterly and entirely changed by the say-so of one man, be he the President of the United States or the Secretary of State.

I think there should be some stability to our tariff policy. If the Republican Party should be successful in the approaching election—of course, that is a remote possibility, but it is a possibility—then I say that every tariff rate we have, or at least all those contained in the agreements with various foreign countries, may be utterly and entirely changed. As the Senator from Wyoming pointed out a few moments ago, rates may be increased 50 percent. We have not repealed the Smoot-Hawley Act. We have not laid down in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act any direction whatsoever as to policy. We have not told the Secretary to lower rates, as I should like to tell him. The result is that we have a tariff policy which is temporary and which has no permanency whatever about it; and by July 1, 1941 17 of the treaties may be entirely wiped off the books and every rate in them changed. I do not want to see such a condition arise.

LEGISLATIVE POWER OF REVIEW

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am very happy that the Senator from Michigan has made that statement, because it certainly helps to clear the atmosphere and clarify the issue before us. Let no one imagine for a moment that I am standing for this amendment for the purpose of harassing the Secretary of State. I served with that eminent and able gentleman as a member of the subcommittee which drafted the Democratic platform in 1932. I know his high-mindedness. I know his fundamentally sound character. I know his unimpeachable integrity. I know his desire to serve his country. But, as the Senator from Michigan has so well said, the program which is now presented to us is altogether unstable and uncertain, and depends upon the very negation of the democratic principle, because it deprives the elected representatives of the people of the United States of the power of review in a matter which is preeminently legislative in character.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, on that very point will the Senator permit me to read the words of the man whom I consider the greatest authority in the country on the tariff? I refer to Professor Taussig, whose excellent work on the tariff I studied many years ago and have since followed. Will the Senator permit me to read a brief paragraph?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very happy to have the Senator do so.

Mr. BROWN. Professor Taussig said:

> The country can adjust itself to extreme protection or high protection or moderate protection or even to free trade, and can go on prosperously under any one of them. But constant vacillations are a great evil. They are not an intolerable evil, for the simple reason that the influence of the protective system on our industrial system, whether for good or ill, is not so far reaching as most people think. But an influence it has, and that influence is particularly bad insofar as it is inconstant and uncalculable. Much of the wiser course, if a protective system must be accepted as part of the settled order of things, would be to shape it in such form that it would endure for a considerable stretch of time; to eliminate the extreme and vulnerable features and make a serious and honest endeavor to establish a regime with which the community might remain content.

I think that is about as fine a statement as can be made of the proposition which the Senator and I are now discussing.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, again I am grateful to the Senator for his contribution to the development of my argument.

I was remarking on the self-sufficiency of Germany and the boasts of the German Government that it is independent of the Allied blockade. Certainly the action of the German war machine tends to bear out that contention. What the facts may be I do not know, but, having read the dispatches from London this morning, I know that the British Government has found that to date the blockade has been ineffective, and that somehow or other the Germans have been able to continue the construction and production of war equipment and war materials. So now Great Britain and France are undertaking to establish an even tighter economic blockade. Whatever the facts may be in that respect—and I do not attempt to judge—I do know that whatever degree of self-sufficiency the German Reich possesses has been due to the progress of technology and chemistry, the achievements of science and invention, and the substitution of what are called synthetic commodities for natural products, in the search for which foreign trade through all the centuries was built up.

SELF-SUFFICIENCY IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. President, if there is one characteristic of the United States of America in its economic life it is that, from the very beginning, it has been devoted to the theory of self-sufficiency, and there has been no distinction between Republicans and Democrats upon this fundamental problem, except occasionally when temporary political expediency seemed to dictate abandonment of the principle. It was Alexander Hamilton who brought in the Report on Manufactures, which still remains a textbook. It was Alexander Hamilton who declared that the economic policy of this Government should be such as to develop American industries in order that the American people might not be dependent upon foreign sources of supply. Hamilton and Jefferson did not agree on many subjects, but, Mr. President, if you read the second annual message of Thomas Jefferson to the Congress of the United States you will see that he, too, saw the virtue and value of protecting and conserving the resources of the Nation and helping to develop them; and if you read the first Democratic platform, the platform that was written for James Madison, the successor of Thomas Jefferson, and one whom we on the Democratic side like to revere as one of the founders of the Democratic Party, you will find that he, too, preached the same doctrine of the development of our own industries.

Mr. President, there is not a single Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate, I am sure, who, at one time or another, has not cast his vote for the development of American industries. I see before me the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD]. He has contributed mightily to the development of our thought upon this question since he became a Member of this body; he has been leading the battle for the encouragement of little business in the United States. What is "little business" in the United States if it is not the development of our own resources, the encouragement of the creation of new industries, and the production of new commodities? I could go down the line from committee to committee and call the roll of bill after bill the purpose of which was to develop our own industries.

Mr. President, let me call attention now to one of the great contributions of Woodrow Wilson. Woodrow Wilson, a great Democratic President, made the United States of America chemically free. He believed that we should no longer be dependent upon Germany for the development of our chemical industry, and he seized the opportunity which was presented by the World War to take over the German patents on dyestuffs and other chemicals, by which our entire chemical industry had been chained, as it were, to the chemical industry of Germany. He established the Chemical Foundation, and he called to his aid a great Democrat, a great citizen of the State of New York, the Honorable Francis P. Garvan, who devoted 20 years of his life, without compensation of any kind, contributing out of his own fortune, to the development of the chemical industry in the United States, in order that the people of this country might be chemically free of Europe. The result of that development has been, without question, the complete liberation of America from control by the chemical cartels of Europe. As a result, today America leads the world in chemistry, and probably the greatest progress being made in business today is being made in this field. Why? Because our Government, under the leadership of a Democratic President, endeavored to cut away and succeeded in cutting away the chains which made us dependent upon Germany.

SHALL WE BE ECONOMICALLY INDEPENDENT

Who will say that that was unwise or wrong? Who can deny, in the face of this record of more than 150 years, that the development of our industries is the most important single task the Government of the United States can undertake? Who, then, Mr. President, is willing to say, with all this record behind us, that we should supinely turn this customs-fixing, this duty-fixing, this revenue-making power over to appointive officials, the identity of whom no man upon this floor knows? That, Mr. President, is the reason why I say that the democratic principle is at stake. I do not mean the principles of the Democratic Party; I mean the principle of responsiveness to the people.

There has never been a single great leader in this democracy, from the time it was founded down to this hour, who has not been devoted to the belief that this is a people's government, not the government of bureaus, not the government of some little group of experts who may be gathered we know not how. I do not speak in disparagement of these gentlemen, because I am convinced that they have made an honest effort, in most instances, to do the right thing by the people of the United States, although there was called to my attention only the other day by a representative of the American Federation of Labor a statement, which I have not had the opportunity as yet to verify but which I am having investigated, that in one agreement a quota upon the importation into this country of shoes manufactured in Europe and coming in competition with shoes made in the United States was fixed so far above the normal export of that nation to the United States that the quota was merely a delusion; it was not a limitation at all upon the importation of shoes; it was an invitation to the foreign country to send in more than it had ever sent before. Is it not possible therefore to understand why the American Federation of Labor at its last convention raised its voice in criticism of this program? The American Federation of Labor is concerned only with the creation of jobs in the United States through the development of American industry.

So I say to you, Mr. President, that the problem of world trade is one of the most difficult and far reaching that can be imagined. There are two sides to it. I am quite willing to say that we should do everything we can to encourage world trade in those commodities which we cannot ourselves develop, but in a world in which we know that the problem is not one of production but one of distribution, in which we know that the solution of our economic ills is to be provided not by bringing in new commodities from Europe but by enabling our own people to purchase the commodities which we ourselves can make, it seems to me that it is an extraordinary thing for the Senate and the House of Representatives to surrender the only protection which the people of America have, namely, the confidence that their elected representatives will on the floor of this body and of the other House and in the committee rooms of the Senate and the House to protect their rights.

You are giving it up; you may go before the Committee on Reciprocity Information and make a plea for cotton; you may make a plea for wheat or for sugar or for manufactured shoes; but under the bill you cannot vote on the question. The people of America sent you here to vote.

THE PERMANENCE OF PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT

Mr. President, how long will parliamentary government in America endure if the elected representatives of the people willingly surrender the right and the duty to vote upon the questions which affect the interests of their constituents?

In my opinion, never was a greater and more fundamental issue presented to the Senate of the United States than the one which is being presented in this debate. We know that parliamentary government throughout the world has tottered. What destroyed it in Germany? What destroyed it in Italy? What made it impossible to grow in Russia? What is it now that undermines it in France and in England? What is it but the reluctance of the elected representatives of the people to exercise the responsibility that was placed upon them, the responsibility they sought when they asked their constituents to elect them to office?

Mr. President, there is now going on a great war. It may be a world war tomorrow, a war in which the economic weapon has become one of the most important, if not the most important. We have seen the Government of Great Britain take advantage of the escape clause in the reciprocal-trade agreement, which was negotiated under the present act. What have we done? Where now is our reciprocity with Great Britain? What advantage have we now, when Great Britain has taken advantage of the escape clause? What is the market for our commodities now? Let the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] read the morning's newspaper, with the speech of the British Premier, with the announcement of new and extended trade pacts in Europe for the purposes of war, and tell me that the Senators of the United States and the Members of the House of Representatives should forego their responsibility in this matter and turn it over to an executive bureau. How can we call ourselves Democrats, how can we call ourselves Americans and do this thing?

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that I am not making any attack upon the distinguished gentleman who sits at the head of the State Department. I honor him, as every Member of this body honors him. I know his good faith; but there is a principle at stake, and great democratic doctrines are most easily undermined when we surrender power into the hands of a man whom we can trust, not knowing when he will be succeeded, or by whom, and whether or not his successor will be equally worthy of our trust and confidence.

Mr. President, we legislate not for men; we legislate to establish principles. We on this floor cannot afford to say, "Cordell Hull is a great and good man"—I say it—"and, because he is a great and good man, we must vote for a proposal which he asks"; certainly not, Mr. President, at a time when democracy is under attack all through the world, and when we know that the great challenge in America, the great opportunity in America, is to defend, to preserve, and to maintain the democratic principle.

But how about this world trade of which so much is said? Automobile manufacturers, yes; industrial executives in New York, yes; great manufacturers, yes; they say they want reciprocity. But what are we getting? Are we getting the substance of world trade, or are we getting only an illusion?

GOLD AND SILVER PURCHASES

Here on my desk is the daily statement of the United States Treasury. It is placed here every morning so that we may have no excuse for not knowing its contents. The daily statement of the Treasury of the United States, under "Assets of the United States," shows gold, 526,650,660 ounces, having a valuation of $18,432,773,101.19.

Where did that gold come from? Did it come to us from world trade? Mr. President, to ask the question is to answer it. We bought the gold.

How did we buy it? We bought it by increasing the debt of the United States.

Who is going to pay that debt? The taxpayers of the United States.

Is not that gold balance the explanation of practically all of our world trade?

When the foreign silver-purchasing program is under attack, the defenders of this program will rise upon this floor and say, "We cannot stop the purchases of foreign silver with money that we borrow from the people of America, because to do it would ruin our foreign trade." What do we mean about foreign trade and reciprocity?

And then we have the Export-Import Bank. How many hundreds of millions have we given to the Export-Import Bank, and for what purpose? To build up foreign trade; to loan to foreign governments and to foreign exporters and to foreign producers the tax money of the people of the United States, in order that those foreign countries may purchase our commodities. Is that foreign trade desirable? It may be, Mr. President. I am not passing any judgment upon that, even now. I am merely pointing out to you, Senators, that this is a complex, a difficult problem, and certainly that it is one which we should not willingly and lightly turn over to an executive arm of the Government, without retaining for ourselves the power of review.

What is going to happen when the war is over? Who will rise on this floor and tell me that? When will the war end—during this 3-year period of extension? Next week? Next month? When will it end? And when it does end, what will be the capacity of Europe to buy the commodities of the United States? Of what value to us then will be this 10-percent of world trade? Is it not our concern rather to devote our attention to building up the market right here at home? We know we have it. We know that there are millions of persons in the United States whose incomes are less than $500 a year. The figures were presented to the Appropriations Committee within the past 2 weeks. More than 4,000,000 families in America are dependent upon an annual income of $500 or less. Eight million additional families are dependent upon an income of less than $1,200, I think the figure was. Twelve million families in this country are unable to purchase the commodities of which we have such an abundance.

There, Mr. President, is the market for the industries of America. There is where our attention should be. But, regardless of that fact, certainly it presents a challenge to our minds when we consider whether or not we should deprive the Congress of the United States which, in part, is to be elected next November, of its constitutional power, without impediments of any kind, to review this question of world trade in the light of the conditions which exist at the time its Members come into office.

Mr. President, Senators may surrender this power for themselves if they are willing to, they may say that they will not take the time or devote the industry to study the needs of their people, they may say that they are willing to commit this responsibility to appointed officials. But let us not say it for the men who may succeed us. Let us not say it for those who in November 1940 will be selected to come to these seats, and to the body at the other end of the Capitol, to pass upon the economic issues which confront America. O, Mr. President, how can we do this thing?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator understand that the agreements reached under these treaties are to stand without change for 3 years?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. An agreement made under the law as it now stands, and as it is proposed to be extended, will be beyond the corrective power of Congress, unless Congress can muster a two-thirds vote to override a possible veto by the President.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator is undoubtedly aware of the fact that the first casualty in a world at war is the truth, and the second casualty is currencies; that is, the value of money. It is already beginning to tumble. And as currencies are destroyed, tariffs and economic and political agreements are entirely upset. I should like to have the distinguished Senator elucidate as to the possibilities of the chaos which may ensue from a tariff agreement, to extend for a fixed period of time, during which other economic forces may be turned loose like a cyclone in summer.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, we behold the world entering upon a condition of chaos. We almost see the very foundations of civilization in Europe shake, and the Congress is asked to bind its eyes and look not upon the facts.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If I may interject another statement, does it not look as though we are acting as if we expect no change to occur in world affairs in the next 3 years?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, we are not only acting as though we expected no change to occur, but we are acting as though the conditions which exist are the same as the conditions which existed 30 years ago.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Or 3 years ago.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I never saw a more unrealistic approach to any fundamental problem than the approach to the one with which we are now dealing. Because we all admire and respect a great leader, because we know that the President of the United States, the present occupant of the White House, has stemmed the tide of disaster for 7 years, that he has been a leader in the march of progress, we are proposing to surrender our own responsibility.

THE CRASH OF CURRENCIES

Mr. President, it seems to me clear that we cannot do that and still think that we are defending democracy. The Senator from Minnesota referred to the crash of currencies. Let me read to him an article which appeared in the Scripps-Howard papers yesterday. I shall read from the Washington Daily News of April 2 an article written by a very eminent and sound economist, a man who looks at things realistically, John T. Flynn, a man who is a liberal, who is a progressive, who wants to see trade developed, who wants not only that, but who wants to see the purchasing power of the masses of the people of America increased so that business and prosperity may be more general. Let me read what Mr. Flynn said:

> Here is a side light on the Hull trade pacts which Congress has been struggling with:
>
> The object of these pacts is to break down the barriers to trade between this country and others because of tariffs. That is a good thing. But you would suppose that those who are so vocal about this would take a really serious look at the whole picture.
>
> At present one of the things that operates as a powerful barrier against international trade is the Government's gold-buying policy. Here is the way it works:
> The cheaper our dollar is the easier it is in theory for other countries to buy here. If I have an English pound in London and can buy four American dollars with that pound, I can use the dollars to buy $4 worth of anything in the United States. But if dollars get cheaper, and I can buy $5 with my English pound, then I can buy $5 worth here. It has the effect of making things cheaper here to the Englishman.
>
> But it has also the very opposite effect on our buying abroad. If it takes five of my dollars to buy a pound then I cannot buy as much in England with those $5 as I could if I could buy a pound with $4.

That is A B C, is it not? That is 2 plus 2 equals 4.

> While in theory it seems to stimulate foreign buying here, it cuts off our buying abroad. And there must be buying both ways in order to have international trade.
> But it also has the effect of draining away from foreign countries all of their gold.

There are $18,000,000,000 plus now in the Treasury of the United States, eighteen billions of gold. And how much silver? That also appears upon the daily statement of the Treasury.

Silver in ounces and silver in dollars, $1,827,989,505.40.

Can people eat gold? Can they eat silver? What are we doing with the gold and the silver which we buy in order to promote foreign trade while we have a reciprocal-trade program? We bring in the gold and bury it at Fort Knox. That may be right; I do not attempt to decide. But I point out again that we are dealing with fundamental issues, and that we are lightly saying to the Department of State, "Here, you take our responsibility, you take our duty. You do it." And we are what Thomas J. Walsh said we might become—too "indolent" to discharge our functions.

Let me proceed with the article of John T. Flynn:

> There must be buying both ways in order to have international trade.
>
> But it also has the effect of draining away from foreign countries all of their gold. The only way foreign countries can trade with us is by paying for what they buy with gold or with goods. But the more we drain away their gold the more impossible it becomes for them to use gold to buy. Their reserves become so depleted that they simply dare not let any more go save for the most imperative reasons. They are reduced, therefore, to the absolute necessity of buying only those things they can pay for with goods of their own.
>
> It is this, more than anything else, which has driven so many countries to barter. They cannot buy goods from us and pay us with their goods unless we buy from them. And the gold-purchase plan, with its high price for gold, makes it more difficult and expensive for us to buy from them, so we buy less.
> And thus this strange policy has the effect, at once and for different reasons, of cutting down our purchasing power abroad and cutting down the purchasing power of foreign countries here.

All this I cite for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that at the most critical period in world trade, in international relations, we are being called on to surrender the power which the people gave to us.

Mr. President, it may be that the Hull program is the way to world peace; it may be that the Hull program is the way to develop international trade and to restore prosperity, but no one has proved it yet, and the contention I make is that when the Department of State enters into a foreign agreement it should bring that agreement to the representatives of the people and say to them, "Here, gentlemen of the House and gentlemen of the Senate, is an agreement we have made dealing with the most intimate concerns of the economic welfare of you people. We recommend it to you." Then the Senator from Illinois, or the Senator from Michigan, or the

Senator from Missouri, or the Senator from Georgia, or the Senator from Minnesota, or the Senator from any State in the Union can rise in his constitutional dignity as a legislative representative of the people of the United States and can ask the question, "How does it affect this, how does it affect that, how does it accomplish its purpose?"

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to have the Senator's opinion on this matter. It seems to me we are putting our international trade in a strait jacket and locking the strait jacket for a period of several years. At the same time, it seems to me we have a right to anticipate terrific changes in international trade, which will find us in a strait jacket. We must be able to meet emergencies as they arise, but we will be helpless, because we will be bound to defend ourselves by measures which would counteract forces that will affect us, and over which we will have no control. We will not even have control of our own destiny, our own affairs, to meet the economic attacks which will be made upon us. Does the Senator think there is some reason to hold that point of view?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I quite agree with what the Senator has said, and I am glad he interrupted me to make the observation, because it clearly illustrates the great danger which we invite not only for ourselves and our country but for the whole world when we deprive ourselves of the right to pass upon trade agreements before they go into effect.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, it seems to me I can picture us possibly finding ourselves in such a position that we may have to go to governments with whom we have made trade agreements and beg for mercy to be relieved of the agreements we have made in order to save our own commerce.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, we not only made an agreement with Great Britain, as I already pointed out, which Great Britain has already avoided—necessarily so, I grant—but we made an agreement with Czechoslovakia, and Czechoslovakia is now a nonexistent country.

Where now is the reciprocal-trade agreement with Czechoslovakia? Europe is upon the verge of a cataclysm, and no man is wise enough to foresee what the result will be to these countries with which we are dealing. How, then, can we safely, in the interest of our own people, deprive ourselves of our constitutional responsibility?

Mr. President, it is altogether impossible for me to see how any Senator can bring himself to that point of view. Perhaps I should not have said that, but I am merely expressing my own opinion. I grant that other Senators, of course, are motivated by the highest ideals, but it seems to me clear that in a world full of alarms, full of uncertainty, full of disaster, the last thing we should do is to give up our constitutional duty to say what the customs rates shall be.

Mr. President, there is another aspect of this matter which I think has been altogether overlooked.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he goes on to the next question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in my understanding that there have been over a thousand international pacts or trade agreements made between the United States and other countries?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; about 22 pacts. A thousand commodities were affected by the 22 pacts.

Mr. LUCAS. It has been said on the floor, whether rightly or wrongly, that the thousand trade pacts——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; 22 pacts, affecting a thousand items.

Mr. LUCAS. Pacts affecting a thousand items. How many trade pacts which are similar to the ones we are now discussing have been made and entered into between the United States and other nations without the adoption of a concurrent resolution by Congress?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. All 22 trade agreements have been so entered into.

Mr. LUCAS. How do the trade agreements we are now considering differ from the 22 trade agreements which were entered into without the adoption of concurrent resolutions?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, they do not differ in any degree whatsoever.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is now making the argument that, regardless of what has transpired in the past with respect to the 22 agreements, he feels now that Congress should act by concurrent resolution upon future agreements before they become effective?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in 1934, when the original Trade Agreements Act was proposed, I offered an amendment upon the floor of the Senate to require that before such agreements should be made effective they should be submitted to Congress. In 1937, when the act was extended, I offered the same amendment. And when it was defeated, as it was defeated before in 1934, I voted against the extension, because of the conviction which I am here expressing, that it is an extremely dangerous thing for us to surrender this legislative power, and I have cited two instances already of pacts which have been made, namely, that with Great Britain, and that with Czechoslovakia, which are now under totally different circumstances and conditions.

My whole point is that this is a legislative power, that the elective, legislative body should at least do itself the justice of passing upon the question.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for one other question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. Can the Senator advise me as to what length of time has been consumed in making the 22 pacts which are in nowise different from the pacts which we are now considering?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The time varied. I am now asking the clerk of the Committee on Finance to ascertain if there is not something in the hearings which answers that question directly. I am advised that there is no definite information on that point.

Mr. LUCAS. May I ask one further question? When was the first pact of this kind made between the United States and a foreign country?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The list of pacts appears in the hearing. Immediately after the act was approved, in June 1934, the State Department began to negotiate trade agreements. The first one on the list is that with Belgium, which became effective on May 1, 1935. The next is with Brazil, which became effective January 1, 1936. The next is with Canada, effective January 1, 1936. The next is a supplemental agreement with Canada, effective January 1, 1936. Another supplemental agreement with Canada, effective January 1, 1940. One with Colombia, effective May 20, 1936.

I may say, with reference to the Canadian agreements, that I pointed out the other day that those three changes were made without new hearings, all upon the basis of the original hearing, thus indicating that they were made to carry out a predetermined policy.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Shall I read the remainder of the pacts on the list?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not care to have the other pacts on the list read.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, since the Senator asked the question, I ask that the list may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks. It appears at page 491 of the hearings on the Extension of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the hearings being had in January of this year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator correctly, the 22 pacts he is now discussing, concerning which I requested information a moment ago, are pacts which have been completed since the trade-agreements program went into effect back in 1934.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. LUCAS. The 22 pacts or agreements, a list of which the Senator has just placed in the RECORD, are agreements that have been made and entered into under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act of 1934?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. What the Senator from Illinois is primarily interested in is previous pacts entered into between the United States and other countries prior to the time we had any reciprocal trade agreements program.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Before we had a program at all?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes. Before we had a trade-agreements program did we ever enter into any pacts similar to those we are discussing which were not ratified by the method which the Senator seeks?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No, Mr. President, we never did.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the point upon which I was not clear, because I was under the impression that over a long period of time—practically from the beginning of the country—the proper governmental agency has entered into international pacts from time to time, which have never come back to Congress for joint action by the two Houses of Congress by way of adopting a concurrent resolution.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am aware that that impression is abroad.

Mr. LUCAS. It is important.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is utterly without foundation. Because the Senator asked the question, I must go back a little to the argument which was presented the other day. The impression arises from the fact that in supporting this program the Department of State has argued that trade agreements are not treaties, and has pointed out that in the past—indeed, from the very beginning of our Government—the Executive has entered into executive agreements, which are not treaties. But those executive agreements to which the State Department alluded were not reciprocal-trade agreements. They were purely executive agreements. The whole burden of the argument of those of us who were supporting the Pittman amendment was that a reciprocal-trade agreement, which calls for bargaining, which calls for mutual obligations, which covers a period of years, and which affects the public welfare, is more than an executive agreement. An executive agreement is the type of executive administrative action which the Executive must necessarily take, and which it is not necessary to submit for ratification, because it is not a treaty.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me complete my answer to the question of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BROWN. On this point——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator can ask his question after the Senator from Illinois has pursued his point.

Mr. LUCAS. Assuming that certain Senators take a different position from that of the Senator from Wyoming with respect to the very point he is discussing, and assuming that certain Senators are——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, no Senator has expressed a different opinion on that point.

Mr. LUCAS. It has been my understanding that a number of Senators believe that these trade agreements are international pacts in the true sense of the word, and not treaties, which are now being discussed by the Senator from Wyoming; and that, as international pacts, they are no different from those the State Department has entered into many times in the past.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no. I think the issue was cleared up very admirably by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] during his discussion of this question. I asked the Senator from Georgia whether or not he believed that an international pact which is not a treaty can modify a treaty. He said no, but that a law can. His contention was—and it is a perfectly appropriate contention—that because of the delegation of power which we are granting we are enabling the Secretary of State and the President to make a law; and a law, of course, can abrogate a treaty. So, according to the argument of those who support them, the trade agreements are not treaties. They are laws, because they are based upon the execution—within allegedly proper standards—of legislative authority delegated by the Congress to the Executive.

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to the able Senator, I followed the argument of the Senator from Georgia very closely, and I did not reach the some conclusion with respect to the necessity for the House of Representatives and the Senate, by majority vote——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; please do not misunderstand me. The Senator from Georgia did not take that position.

Mr. LUCAS. I did not think he did. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No. He took the position that there was an adequate and satisfactory delegation of power. In my argument today I am waiving that argument altogether. I do not want to pursue the constitutional argument. I am calling to the attention of the Senate the imperious necessity of our not delegating the power, and of reviewing the acts of our agents.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I misapprehended the question of the Senator from Illinois. I thought he had asked whether or not we have heretofore entered into a reciprocal arrangement with any other country; but as I think it over, I presume he was referring to reciprocal agreements which were not treaties. Of course, in 1854 we entered into a reciprocal-trade agreement with Canada by which considerable trade was effected. However, that arrangement was a treaty and not an agreement.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It was a treaty.

Mr. BROWN. Which required ratification by the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL CENTRALISM

Mr. President, I now desire to pursue only briefly what seems to me to be perhaps the most important phase of the whole argument. How does it come that democratic bodies, popular bodies, representative parliamentary institutions, such as our Congress, have been surrendering their power? Obviously the world is suffering from the economic disease—if it may be so called—of centralism. We are turning back the clock of history. Members of the Senate stand in this body because the men whose busts ornament this Chamber believed—as their predecessors for a thousand years believed—that the safest and best government is a government of the people, and that power should be taken away from central authority and distributed as widely as possible among the masses.

The whole history of our institutions, from the drafting of the Magna Carta down to the Declaration of Independence and the writing of the Constitution of the United States, has been the history of free people taking power away from central authority and giving it to the masses. So we established what some of our predecessors have proudly called "an indestructible Union of indestructible States." But the same conditions which have destroyed parliamentary government in Europe and brought about the establishment of strong central government have been operating in the United States for 50 years. Year after year, out of the imperious necessity of the occasion, we have been creating new and greater and more powerful bureaus in Washington to carry on the affairs of this free Government. It makes no difference what party has been in power. We find the same story of the creation of new Government agencies to control our business development and our industry.

We began in 1887 with the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Because the railroads had grown so great that they were no longer susceptible to regulation in the public interest by the States, the people turned to Washington and set up the Interstate Commerce Commission, and delegated certain powers to that Commission. A Democratic House of Representatives passed the first of such bills. A Republican Congress passed an amendatory act. Democrats and Republicans alike created these new institutions.

I could take the time of the Senate to go through the list of 15 or 20 different acts which have been passed from time to time, and point out the trend toward centralism and the breaking down of State authority and local self-government. During the administration of Warren G. Harding the Packers and Stockyards Act was passed. Every progressive and liberal leader in the country was for it. It had to be passed. It was a proper thing to be passed. There was no doubt about it. But it was another step in the steady growth of centralism.

All this centralism of government has been the direct result of the progressive centralism of our economic existence. As the means of transportation and communication improved, as men became able to transmit the spoken or written word from one end of the country to the other by means of the telephone, the telegraph, or the radio, and to pass from one end of the country to the other by steam train, by automobile over good roads, and by airplane, there was a steady centralization of the economic life of the country which has proceeded at a pace that few of us have taken the time to comprehend.

I have brought here, so that Senators may see it, a chart which presents in graphic form some of the evidence that was brought out before the Temporary National Economic Committee. Early in the present administration Congress passed a law which compelled the divorcement of banks and security companies. It was a wise and salutary law, because one of the factors which had contributed to the crash of 1929 was that in some instances the officers of banks were more interested in selling the securities of their affiliates for a profit than they were in handling their depositors' money. It is not necessary for me to go into that story, but bear in mind that, as a result of that law passed during this administration, the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. found itself obliged to choose between the banking business and the security business. J. P. Morgan & Co. decided to remain in the banking business, and the firm of Morgan, Stanley & Co. was created to handle the security business.

The undisputed testimony which was brought out at that hearing is represented upon this chart. I had the chart made because it is so illuminating. Beginning with September 16, 1935, down to shortly before the hearings were held the security firm of Morgan, Stanley & Co. sold 73 original issues, every single one of which was sold under this administration. The 73 issues represented the securities of about 43 of the largest industrial companies in the United States. The firm of Morgan, Stanley & Co. made a gross profit of something over $2,000,000 in the transactions. I did not ask for the net profit, because I was not interested in that, nor were the other members of the committee. To me the significant point brought out at the hearing was the centralism of our economic life. So, in order to make it clear, I had this chart prepared, with lines drawn from the central office of each one of these 43 companies through the States which are affected by the business carried on by those companies. From New York city a mass of black lines extend all through the United States.

Most of these corporations are of great assistance to our national economy. All of them, doubtless, are well managed. They all contribute to our economic welfare. There is no criticism of the existence of these corporations, and I utter no criticism of Morgan, Stanley & Co. I am merely pointing out the fact that during this administration they sold some 73 security issues of 43 national companies; and this chart represents the centralism of our economic life.

Mr. President, let me show the effect upon the States. The chart I now have before me is made on smooth, soft paper, so that it will be difficult to exhibit it, but I had it prepared for the purpose of illustrating to Members of the Senate the comparative financial strength of 30 of the great corporations of the United States and of the sovereign States of the Federal Union.

There are 30 great American corporations each with assets of more than a billion dollars. There are 22 States, sovereign States, in the Union the entire assessed value of whose real estate is less than a billion dollars each.

There are 16 States in the Federal Union the total assessed value of all the property of which, both real and personal, is less than a billion dollars each.

This chart shows that the largest of these 30 great corporations are the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., both of them great institutions, both of them most helpful institutions, but each one of them having assets of more than $4,000,000,000. Only the States of Wisconsin, Indiana, Illinois, New Jersey, Michigan, Massachusetts, California, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York are financially stronger than those two institutions.

Do you wonder, Mr. President, why political centralism has developed? Our economic life is necessarily centralized because of the development and improvement of technology, and, as it has developed, the people have turned more and more to Washington for governance, for aid, for relief, for all manner of contributions. Why? Because the States are no longer sufficiently wealthy and powerful to cope with the economic problem.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I get the impression from viewing the first chart of the Senator and from his remarks that, as a result of the centralization, these tubes stretching out across even to the outer States of the Union are a kind of economic milking machine; the States are being milked of the product of their toil and their wealth, and it is being centralized in the East. So people come to Washington and use the powers of the Federal Government to get some of it back to feed the hungry and the unemployed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I would not want today to make any invidious aspersion on the management of these corporations.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I, myself, did not intend to make any aspersion.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand that, but I want to make it clear, because I wish to say to the Members of the Senate that, as a result of almost 2 years of study of this economic problem, what has impressed me more than anything else, is the desire of the great majority of the people of America, whether they are in business or in the Government, to maintain the democratic principle.

Mr. President, my thought in bringing these charts before the Senate has been merely to illustrate what I believe to be the connection between the growing power of the Government and the decline of democracy and the economic situation. Not from choice do the people of the States give up local self-government and turn to Washington. It is because there is no other power speaking for the people save the Government at Washington which is capable of protecting them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator think there is a relationship between this centralization of power in our political life and the centralization of economic power?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Absolutely. The two things are indissolubly bound together. It was when the economic centralization began to develop that the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission was needed first, and then the passage of the Sherman antitrust law. When trusts came into existence to extend commercial and economic power beyond State lines, it became necessary for the Federal Government to intervene; and the diffifficulty has been—though I am not discussing that subject this afternoon—that in the creation of new Federal authority we have perhaps gone further than we needed to go because we did not follow another and more clearly defined road.

The late Senator John Sharp Williams, a distinguished Member of this body, in 1911 introduced a bill which, if enacted, in my opinion would have made unnecessary a great deal of the expansion of the bureau power, and probably would have prevented the crash of 1929, when he asked for the exercise of the congressional power over the regulation of commerce to establish a licensing system for national corporations. That, however, is a question which it would take another day to discuss, and I do not want to enter upon it now, except to say that when William Howard Taft was President he sent to this body a national charter bill which was drafted by his Attorney General, George W. Wickersham; but the Congresses in those days were unwilling to adopt that solution, because they felt that it would create too much Federal power. They chose, instead, the system of building up new and greater and better and bigger bureaus than ever. Had they chosen the other path, I think that local authority would have been more successfully defended.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. Shipstead. If I correctly understand the Senator, he thinks this constant centralization of political power comes directly or indirectly as a result of the prior concentration of economic power?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Directly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And that economic power is centered in corporations.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Corporations are creatures of States.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And as creatures of governments they are now becoming so powerful that they threaten the very life of their creators.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have been greatly interested in this symposium and agreement between the Senators who apparently have been glorifying the trend of the present administration toward centralization of power.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. O Mr. President——

Mr. AUSTIN. Just a moment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not want the Senator to put words in my mouth. I am not glorifying the trend toward centralization. I am deprecating it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if that is the conclusion that should be drawn from the discussion to which I have recently listened, I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he has discovered in the course of his chairmanship of the T. N. E. C. that four-fifths of all the money appropriated for the use of that committee is being used to promote centralization of authority in Washington and to remove from the several States their traditional control over production and manufacturing and mining and intrastate commerce?

I should like to have that question answered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am very glad to answer it. The answer is in the negative. The Senator is quite wrong. No part of the money that has been appropriated for the T. N. E. C. has been used for any such purpose. I am aware that there are those who seek to disseminate that point of view, but I wish to assure the Senator that the committee's study has continued to be what I said at the outset it would be—namely, an objective study of our economic affairs—and no recommendations have been made save those that were contained in the preliminary report of the committee; and certainly nobody can properly say that there has been any expenditure for the purpose of concentrating in Washington power and authority which should have been distributed among the States.

I hope the Senator will not lead me away from the point under discussion, which is simply that economic centralism, which is clear to be seen by anybody who takes the time to look at the condition, has been the cause of political centralism; and I am now proposing to Senators and to Members of the House that, heeding this development of centralism, they shall not now surrender to an executive bureau another element of Congressional legislative authority and power.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask the Senator whether he does not now appreciate that it would have been wiser from all points of view to distribute the control of the half-million dollars appropriated to the committee for its studies, in such a way that the legislative part of the committee could have had at least equally as good a chance to prepare for examination of the witnesses who came before the committee, as did those who represented the executive branch of the committee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I very much fear that the Senator from Vermont is now exercising his prerogative as a partisan Republican, and making a campaign talk.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I may say to the Senator in all sincerity, that his remark is not warranted. No legislative member of the committee has at any time lacked the complete cooperation of all the other members of the committee and of the bureaus. I can assure the Senator of that fact.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. In view of the comment regarding the motive behind my question, I call attention——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I withdraw the comment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Very well. It has been said. Mr. President, allow me to say that the RECORD speaks as eloquently as anything ever can speak of the sincerity of my position, because it will show to all who desire to read it that when the appropriation was made I understood that there would be such an allocation of the fund that the part of the committee representing the legislative branch of the Government would have at least an equal opportunity with the part of the committee representing the executive branch; and when the matter came out of the committee and on the floor, and I here discovered that something had happened to change that plan, I then announced that I withdrew my support from that which I would have gladly supported before, in view of the change made after the provision left the Committee on the Judiciary. That was my position then, and now I feel that events have proved that my views regarding the matter were somewhat justified.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ought to say, of course, that there is no Member of this body for whose sincerity of purpose and ability I have greater respect than for the sincerity and ability of the Senator from Vermont. That, however, is a question which can await another day. The point I am emphasizing here is a very simple one, namely, that the progress of economic centralism has brought with it the development of political centralism; and in a country which was devoted to the theory that the greatest possible measure of local self-government should be maintained, we have seen power and authority diverted from the States and concentrated here in Washington, just as we have seen government power concentrated in the great capitals of Europe. The cities of America and the States of America turn to Washington for aid in this, and for aid in that. We come here seeking appropriations to build projects out through the States. We come here seeking appropriations to make work for the unemployed, and necessarily so. We must do it, because of the conditions which have developed; but what I am calling to the attention of the Senate is that the elected representatives of the people in Washington are to be found only here in the Senate Chamber, over in the House of Representatives, and in the President and Vice President of the United States.

THE POWER OF APPOINTIVE OFFICERS

All the other Government employees in Washington, all of the Government agents to whom we have delegated legislative power, with protection of one kind or another, according to this standard, or according to that standard, all of this power which we have necessarily delegated, has been vested in appointive officers. So we have seen the development of a thousand years of decentralization of government turned back upon itself, and now, instead of decentralized government we are seeing the whole world develop a greater and greater degree of centralized government. That is the primary reason why I stand here today asking the Senate of the United States to give its support to the amendment I have offered, the sole purpose of which is to retain in the Senate and the House, in the elected representatives of the people, some degree of their own constitutional power, so that the trade agreements, which are to deal with our underlying economic life, shall be approved and made effective, not by the act of appointive officials reporting to the President but by the approval of the elected Members of the House and Members of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I regret that I have been absent during most of the Senator's able speech, and therefore I may be making an inquiry in a field he has already covered. I presume he is discussing his amendment which would require concurrent action by the Congress in approval of any agreements made by the Executive. Am I correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am discussing the amendment which would require congressional approval.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator what person will be the Chief Executive after January 1 to make these agreements? Does anyone know?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No person in this Chamber, no person in this country can tell. That question cannot be answered by any human being.

Mr. WALSH. We know what President Roosevelt has done and how he has handled this problem; we know how Secretary Hull has handled it. Who will deal with this difficult problem after January 1 no living being knows, and a vote on the joint resolution without the amendment for concurrent action by the Congress is a vote for the unknown and the uncertain and for administration of a grave responsibility by those of whose political views on tariff legislation we have no knowledge.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am grateful to the Senate for the attention it has given me. Let me now ask whether there has been transmitted to the clerk the modification of the amendment which I desire to propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk advises the Chair that he has no modification of the amendment on his desk.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, during the course of the discussion the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] interrupted me to say that the amendment would be strengthened if it were modified to include a provision that no agreement should be abrogated without the approval of the Senate and the House. I called for the legislative counsel in order that there might be drafted a modification of my amendment which would be satisfactory to the Senator from Michigan. Apparently it has not been handed to the clerk. I shall offer it a little later.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Would the proposed amendment embodied in the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan apply in future only, or would it apply to treaties or agreements which are now in existence?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It would apply to any future abrogation.

Mr. KING. Not to agreements which have heretofore been entered into?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have not seen the modification of the amendment yet.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	Johnson, Colo.	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Downey	King	Reed
Austin	Ellender	La Follette	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] primarily because if we are obliged to assume that these undertakings are agreements between nations, and are not treaties, still I should want to have that part of the transaction which constitutes legislating performed by the Congress in the usual way. So I treat this amendment as meaning that no duties or import restrictions specified in a proclamation issued by the President to carry out any foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under the authority delegated to the President by section 350 as amended, and no amendatory or supplementary agreement hereafter entered into under such section shall take effect or may be modified in future until the Congress has specifically approved the duties and other import restrictions so specified to carry out such agreement.

I believe it will be necessary to treat this amendment as if it means that if I am to remain consistent with my theory that for the negotiation of agreements we must leave the executive department untrammeled and ungoverned by the Congress of the United States and that we must confine our activities to purely legislative conduct.

I make this explanation so that I may not be confronted at some time in the future with the charge that by voting for the pending amendment I confused my own thought as to what these undertakings are, as to whether they are treaties or agreements.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I did not have the privilege of hearing all the statement made by the distinguished Senator, and perhaps I may be covering ground which he has covered, but I ask for my own information whether or not he construes the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming as impinging in any way upon the prerogatives of the Executive in negotiating treaties of any character?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not, as I understand it. I understand it, as I have heretofore stated. I think it is possible for a skillful analyst to take this amendment and criticize it from the point of view to which the Senator from Utah refers; that is, wherein it has for its principal purpose the passing upon foreign trade agreements by Congress, I would not so write it myself, but I shall not be finicky about the wording. I shall support it on the theory that it is substantive legislation necessary to make the agreements effective, namely, the creation or modification of duties and import restrictions and regulations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate; but I may say that the interpretation placed by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] upon the amendment is such as I, after a very hurried reading, have also placed upon it. If I believe that it in any way interferes with the prerogatives of the Chief Executive or interferes with the duties and responsibilities which rest upon him under the Constitution, I shall vote against it. But if I shall construe it to mean merely a legislative affirmation of our views in regard to a matter of which the Congress of the United States has cognizance, then I believe there can be no objection to it on the ground that it is an interference with or an impingement upon the powers and authority of the President of the United States.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 5, 6, 7, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, and 35, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"TEMPORARY NATIONAL ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$306,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the contents of the conference report. The report is on the first deficiency bill, which includes the item providing for the eradication of grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and other pests. It will be recalled that the House originally appropriated $2,000,000 for the purpose. The Senate increased the amount to $3,000,000. The Senate conferees, in the course of the first conference, acceded to the House contention. When the first conference report came to the Senate it was rejected by the Senate. The conferees, after some delay in action by the House, have had a further conference, and we now report a compromise with the House conferees, which represents a split of the difference, so that the appropriation is two and a half million dollars instead of $2,000,000.

I think those Members of the Senate who objected to the conference report have demonstrated that the conferees on the part of the Senate originally were wrong in thinking that they could not obtain an increase in the amount.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I stated at the time the report was first submitted, and I wish to state again, that the position which I took should not be interpreted in any way as an indication that I thought the conferees had not done as well as they thought they could for the Senate position in the original conference. It was only my opinion that if the conference report was rejected, and a yea-and-nay vote was taken, it might strengthen the arm of the Senate conferees in conference.

If the Senator from Colorado will yield further, I should like to say that, while I regret that the full amount could not be obtained, I realize that in a situation of this kind there must be compromise. So far as I am concerned, I think all that those of us who are interested in this item can do is to accept the compromise, and I personally should like to express my appreciation to the Senator from Colorado and his colleagues on the conference committee for the able manner in which they have put up a fight for the Senate's position.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, was that the only matter in controversy?

Mr. ADAMS. There was one lesser item which the Senator may recall. There was an item of $8,000 in reference to a Pan American Indian conference. The House struck it out. We placed that item in the bill. The House receded to the extent that they were willing to leave provision for the conference in the report provided the amount were reduced from $8,000 to $2,000, which was in accordance with the desire of the Department. The Department was very much concerned with continuing the recognition of the Indian conference. Officials of the Department said that the United States having begun the conference, they felt they would be humiliated and embarrassed if it was not included in the measure. That is the only other item in dispute.

Mr. KING. As I understand the conference report, the Senate, by refusing to approve the conference report in the beginning, has gained an addition of $500,000?

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. KING. Because of the fact that I know something of this harmful pest, and the devastation and ruin which it has occasioned in many of the Western States, I regret that the full amount provided by the Senate was not included in the measure. As did my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, I congratulate my friend, the Senator from Colorado, on being able to secure the addition of $500,000.

Mr. ADAMS. We did the best we could.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, representing one of the States vitally interested in the problem of insect-pest control, I wish to say that I have great confidence in the ability and the effort made by the distinguished Senator from Colorado, and I wish to express my appreciation for the result of his efforts in this matter.

Still I do not believe that the amount now provided under the compromise will be entirely adequate to carry out the control program, but I am sure that if the time comes when it may appear that it is necessary to have additional funds, we shall have the assistance of the able Senator from Colorado in obtaining more funds for this purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the House message on Senate amendment No. 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its action on Senate amendment No. 9 to House bill 8641, which was read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 3, 1940.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 9 to the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the sum named in said amendment, insert "$2,000."

Mr. ADAMS. I move the Senate concur in the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 9.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire now to present the modification of the amendment, which was drafted as the result of a colloquy between me and the junior Senator from Michigan. It is by way of an addition to the amendment which has already been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the modification of the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of Mr. O'MAHONEY'S amendment it is proposed to add the following:

and no notice of termination under section 2 (b) of such act of June 12, 1934, shall take effect with respect to any foreign trade agreement, or any amendatory or supplementary agreement, hereafter entered into under such section 350, until the Congress by law has specifically approved such notice of termination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming, as modified.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us have a vote.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. I withdraw my suggestion of no quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the roll is called I wish to state very briefly my position with respect to the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I am not persuaded that the present reciprocal trade agreements program, with its delegation of authority to the Executive, should be made a permanent policy of our Government. I supported the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act when it first came before the Congress in 1934 on the basis that it was a temporary expedient to deal with the then disordered state of international trade and the desirability of expanding, if posible, foreign markets for United States products, while preserving such tariffs as experience had demonstrated were repuired for the protection of American workers.

We were then in the midst of a desperate economic crisis, which was truly an emergency, and we were attempting to deal with it constructively, but on an emergency basis. Though the administration had sought the passage of the act without any time limitation, the Committee on Finance, of which I was a member, conditioned its approval of the proposal upon the basis of a 3-year limitation. The Congress enacted the measure on that basis.

The benefits which it would be possible to achieve through the proposed reciprocal trade agreement mechanism was a debatable question—it was an experiment, and still is. It seemed to me then that the delegation to the Executive of the authority and responsibility which rested with the Congress could be justified only upon this assumption that it was a temporary expedient of limited duration to cope with extraordinary conditions. It was on that account that I supported the resolution in 1934.

I voted for the joint resolution in 1937, which postponed until June of this year the expiration of the original Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act because it was plain that the upset state of world trade was still acute; because it was evident that the 3-year term originally specified had been insufficient to carry out the contemplated program; because in 1937, as in 1934, the question was not approval of a permanent arrangement, but simply a temporary grant of authority in an emergency.

Mr. President, the question is now again before the Congress upon request of the Executive, for a further 3-year postponement of the expiration date of the trade agreement making authority. Two questions now confront us in the consideration of this problem. The first is whether on the basis of the record this program has been a success or a failure, whether it has been beneficial or harmful. The second is what benefit may accrue from a continuation of this effort to negotiate reciprocal-trade agreements, what can we expect to gain in the face of world conditions today, with Europe in the flames of war?

SUCCESS OR FAILURE

Has the present arrangement been a success or failure? It seems to me that the claims made in behalf of the reciprocal trade agreement program have been somewhat exaggerated.

Keeping closely in view the objective of the reciprocal trade agreements, the correction of excessive tariff rates is only an incidental feature of this program. The removal of tariff barriers was not to be an end, but the means to an end—the end sought being the development and expansion of American foreign trade—the opening of foreign markets to American goods. It seems to me that is the test or measure we must apply in attempting to appraise the worth and value of this program.

We must recognize the reality that we cannot sell in the world markets if we do not buy. Therefore, the problem which confronted those to whom we delegated this authority was how to adjust rates and exchange concessions which would open world markets for American goods, and on the other hand not permit the inflow into this country of foreign goods to impair the domestic markets for our domestic producers.

Tariffs are not the only restrictions to the flow of trade. Although a larger proportion of the world's trade is now subject to tariff duties than a decade ago, there are other forms of restrictive devices such as import licenses, exchange controls, import controls, and clearing agreements. And it must be remembered that these trade barriers not only serve as deterrents to trade but also tend to divert, by arbitrary and discriminatory means, what trade remains into uneconomic channels. The mere modification of foreign tariff rates would not accomplish the purpose of the act, as, for example, in the case of Netherlands which has low tariff rates; the main purpose of negotiating a trade agreement in that case was to obtain mitigation of other forms of restrictive devices practiced against foreign trade. This function clearly could not be performed by the Congress for it has no machinery of its own to negotiate trade questions with foreign governments.

Also the increasing use of quotas in concessions granted by the United States in these agreements is evidence of the attention given to the possibilities of the need to control the increase in the flow of trade that might occur following reductions in rates under trade agreements. It is only fair to say that in these important aspects of the matter there have been commendable results.

We are now met with a vast amount of statistical data concerning our foreign trade with contradictory claims as to what it shows and what it proves. But my own conclusion, on the basis of the record, is that the benefits and advantages which are claimed, by the proponents, to flow from the trade agreements already negotiated are still hopes rather than realities. This may be due to the fact that international markets have been completely disrupted and, of course, our inability to evaluate the amount of foreign trade that has resulted solely from these agreements.

The second part of this question relates to the damage which opponents of the program contend has resulted from the tariff reductions already effectuated. The hurt to certain groups in certain particulars, by reason of concessions contained in some of the reciprocal-trade agreements must be recognized and ought to be corrected, but are not, in my judgment, so grievous as is contended.

We come now to my second question, namely, What can we expect to gain by continuing this temporary authority for another 3 years? Dislocation of international trade in consequence of the war is beyond dispute. The administration predicates its request for a continuation of this authority upon the plea that it may prove an important adjunct in post-war trade adjustments and in removing economic and trade barriers in which so often, as history has shown, lie the seeds of war. Certainly if this program can contribute in the slightest degree to the promotion or to the maintenance of peace, that is impelling reason for its continuance. No man may venture to say how long the war will continue nor what conditions will confront the United States and the world when the war ends. For myself I feel there is considerable force in the argument that under existing conditions it is unwise to terminate this authority at this juncture in world affairs.

A LEGISLATIVE FUNCTION

I repeat, feeling as I do that tariff making is essentially a legislative function, that I am unwilling to suspend any longer than necessary the return to the constitutional plan of legislative approval of tariff rates. This is said with full realization of the imperfections of congressional tariff making.

Mr. President, we are now asked to extend the authority for 3 years more, not to President Roosevelt, not to Secretary Hull, but to some unknown person, whose political philosophy or tariff views no one knows. No one knows whether he will be an extreme tariff protectionist or a free-trader. We are asked to delegate that authority for 3 years to an unknown person whom no living man can name. Will he be a Democrat or a Republican? Will he be a protectionist or a free-trader? Who knows?

Personally I feel very strongly that there ought to be an agency in this Government to negotiate with foreign countries to see how best we can serve each other's interests by satisfactory trade relations. I wish to preserve and maintain such an agency. I think it is highly desirable. I think it would be helpful to the Congress even if we should return to the old method of action only by Congress. Therefore I should regret to see this law defeated by reason of failure upon the part of Congress to grant the extension. However, I feel that the worst of the emergency is over, and that the conditions which existed 3 years ago or 6 years ago no longer exist. For that reason I do not propose by my vote to give to a stand-pat tariff protectionist of the extreme type, or a free-trader, the authority solely and alone to boost or to cut rates with a stroke of the pen.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator think there is any reasonable human probability that any nation would seek to bargain with us to raise our tariff rates against that nation, no matter who is President?

Mr. WALSH. The President has such power.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Only if he bargains with some foreign nation to that effect.

Mr. WALSH. It is conceivable.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator think there is any probability of a foreign nation deliberately bargaining with us to raise our tariff rates against them?

Mr. WALSH. One of the weaknesses of the system is that we have been knocking at the chancellery doors of every country in Europe, asking them to have trade relations with us. I never knew of anyone going around and begging for an agreement who did not have to surrender or sacrifice something. I never knew of a person begging and beseeching agreements for trade relations who was not first asked the question, "What are you willing to surrender?" I favor the effort, but I insist it must be without a surrender of American interests.

I make the prediction that after 3 years we shall never again have a reciprocal-trade agreements bill before Congress. I suppose Senators think I am a little severe when I make that prediction, in view of the fact that I have said much in favor of the agreements. I shall vote for the joint resolution if the pending amendment shall be adopted. However, I think anyone is blind who has not seen the growing opposition in this country to reciprocal-trade agreements. No Member of Congress can go up and down the country saying that 1,000 tariff duties have been cut without being immediately placed on the defensive. He is asked, "Why have you cut them?"

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Does not the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] a moment ago indicate that the trade agreements, by cutting tariffs, are in the interest of the foreign governments rather than in our own interest? We are told that no foreign government would in any way seek to have the rates increased.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's trend of thought, but if he will yield to me for just a moment——

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The whole theory of the reciprocal-trade agreements is mutual concession. Certainly no nation would ask for a concession against itself.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has nearly given the answer to my question; but it seems to me that he has not fairly answered the question of the Senator from Missouri, which to me seems almost fundamental.

Mr. WALSH. That no country would ask us to raise our rates?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator himself expressed the fear that a high protectionist might be President, or a free trader might be President. I concede that either of those contingencies might happen. The Senator is correct in that respect. However, it seems to me, as suggested by the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], that a high protectionist would find it impossible ever to negotiate an agreement with any country by which he could put his high protection ideas into force.

Mr. WALSH. He would not find it impossible to refuse to reduce a rate when he ought to do so. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. He would not find it impossible to do what?

Mr. WALSH. He would not find it impossible to refuse to reduce a rate when he ought to do so in order to obtain an agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's own theory is that such a President would increase rates; and I do not see how that result would come about.

Mr. WALSH. My theory is that there may have been too much cutting of rates in the past. Of course, there ought to be some cutting of rates. I do not agree that a President should maintain all the high rates which exist in the present tariff laws. So it is entirely a question of the political philosophy of the individual—the President or the Secretary of State.

I wish to repeat what I previously said—and I am merely giving my observation. I should be sorry to see this law completely wiped off the statute books. I want some department of the Government to keep open relations with foreign countries and to make recommendations to Congress, to see in what particulars we can build up and maintain our foreign trade. However, in my opinion the opposition in this country to reciprocal-trade agreements has been steadily growing. Every vote which has been taken in this Chamber on the question shows it. The very fact that the Republican Members have united as completely as never before on this issue, which has been before the Congress for years, shows that they sense and understand that they have a political advantage in opposing these agreements.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask the Senator whether or not he interprets the act as I do. It provides that the President shall have authority—

(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

I construe that——

Mr. WALSH. As an embargo?

Mr. PITTMAN. It means that he has a right to place an embargo.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator. The present President—or the next President, if the present President shall leave the White House—has authority and power to declare an embargo if he sees fit.

Mr. PITTMAN. Or to place in effect any other restriction which he sees fit.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. He may do so without any agreement with any other government.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Therefore it is not essential to have an agreement to place an embargo.

Mr. WALSH. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The whole theory of the law is that there must be a mutuality of interest between our country and any other country with which we negotiate an agreement. I think it will be conceded that the President could issue an embargo under existing law, but not under a mutual trade agreement, because it would be inconceivable that we could offer any country an advantage which would offset an absolute prohibition against the importation of its goods into the United States and thus induce it to enter into a mutual agreement. Does not the Senator feel that that statement is correct?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. What inducement could we offer any nation to persuade it to enter into an agreement granting us some concession if we should embargo something which it wants to sell us? How could we hope, or how could any President hope, to negotiate an agreement with any country making it still more difficult for that country to send its goods into the United States in order to make it easier for us to send our goods into that country?

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator is correct; but what I am suggesting is that in the zeal, in the enthusiasm, in the burning desire to increase our exports, we are likely, in some instances, to sacrifice our own interests.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be possible, as the Senator has stated, that there have been mistakes made here and there; no government is perfect; no head of a government is perfect; and it would be a miracle if in all the agreements which might be entered into no American would have any basis for feeling that his particular interest had not been in some respects impinged upon. But I support this program, as I think the Senator from Massachusetts supports it, because on the whole it has been very helpful.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me that it is our duty as legislators to consider the effect of what we do on the Nation as a whole, although we cannot, of course, lose sight of our own individual interests closer at home. Does the Senator agree with me?

Mr. WALSH. I certainly do.

Mr. BARKLEY. That being true, we defeated the other day the amendment offered by my devoted friend, my great friend, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] requiring senatorial ratification by a two-thirds vote. If there was any large group of men in this body who desired to prevent a vote on the question of congressional approval, would it not be just as feasible and as easy for them to prevent a vote on a resolution of approval requiring a mere majority as it would upon a ratification resolution requiring a two-thirds vote?

Mr. WALSH. I intend to discuss that later, if the Senator will permit me, and to give the reasons why I voted against the proposal of the Senator from Nevada, and why I favor the pending proposal.

I should like to say, however, at this juncture that, in my opinion, there is one principle in tariff making that is practically unanimously supported by the American people. The American people desire, first and foremost, the domestic market to be preserved and maintained for, and a free, unrestrained opportunity given to, the domestic producer to trade therein without destructive foreign competition. I do not believe there is any serious opposition anywhere in any party to that principle.

The difficulty, as I see it—and that is why I predict what is going to happen—is that unless the agency making these agreements militantly, enthusiastically, and courageously says, "Do not impair our domestic market; this domestic market must be saved and secured for the domestic producer; what the foreign nation can sell us over and above that, the luxuries and necessities they can sell us which we do not produce, we are glad to have."

If that is the state of mind of the present President, and the present Secretary of State, will the state of mind of the next President, and the next Secretary of State be that the domestic market shall not be impaired for the domestic producer? That is fundamental, and I am not going to give that authority to anybody unless I am convinced that that is his attitude.

Now let me come to the question raised by the Senator from Kentucky. I voted reluctantly against the proposal of the able Senator from Nevada. I thought a very powerful argument could be made on either side of that question. What finally convinced me to vote against it was that I thought there was, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Kentucky, so much good in these agreements that ought to be retained that I did not want to be in the position of voting for an amendment which provided for treating them as if they were treaties, for I felt that it would be possible at any time for a partisan group to get together in this Chamber and obtain a third of the votes and prevent any action at all. In other words, I thought it would be nullification.

I am free to confess that when I reached that conclusion perhaps I did not look into the question solely and alone from the legalisic and constitutional standpoint; but I am confronted now with the question, as is every other Senator here, has the operation of these agreements been such as to lead me to vote in favor of a continuance of the policy for 3 years or has the time come when we ought to go back to what we surrendered only temporarily, to what we surrendered only because there was an emergency, to what we surrendered only because of chaotic world conditions. Is it time to come back to what is the fundamental law, to what is the constitutional requirement that the levying of taxes—and no one questions the fact that tariffs are taxes—is a function of the Congress. So I have reached the conclusion that if an agreement is beneficial to the best interests of our country unless it contains some errors or some mistakes or some injuries, or some harm that is conspicuous, it will be possible always to get a majority vote in the Congress.

We had this same fight in connection with the reorganization bill. It was then sought to give to the President the power to reorganize governmental agencies without requiring that any action he might take should come back to the Congress for approval or disapproval. In my opinion, any recommendation made by the present President of the United States for the reorganization of any department or any group of departments would get a majority vote at any time in both branches and, in my opinion, any trade agreements negotiated by him will get a majority vote in both branches.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator said a moment ago—I think it was a slip of the tongue—that it would be as easy to get a majority.

Mr. WALSH. As I recall, I said that the requirement for a two-thirds vote would amount practically to nullification.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understood the Senator to say that if a vote was obtained it would be easier to obtain a majority than a two-thirds, but if a vote were never obtained it would make very little difference whether if a vote could have been obtained it could have been carried by two-thirds or by a mere majority. The effect would be the same if a vote could never be obtained; and any minority that might prevent a vote or even prevent ratification if a two-thirds vote were required, might prevent a vote even where a majority was required.

Mr. WALSH. I am willing to limit the time when action must be taken by the House and by the Senate, as was done in the case of the reorganization bill, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] reminds me.

Think of the position we are in. Nineteen of the twenty-two countries which have entered into trade agreements with us had action by their parliaments before the agreements became effective. Yet we boast of a great democracy.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not true that most of the agreements ratified by other countries took effect immediately when they were signed, and that the ratification was subsequent?

Mr. WALSH. I think that is true, but the agreements had to be ratified.

Mr. GEORGE. They were subsequently ratified, but those countries have a different parliamentary system. The agreements became effective, I think, in most instances when actually executed.

Mr. WALSH. We could provide that after an agreement has become effective it shall be submitted to Congress to be ratified, and that if not ratified it shall cease to be effective.

Mr. GEORGE. This amendment, the Senator must know, if it should be adopted, would make every trade agreement a tariff bill, subject to amendment, subject to bringing in any other article or item that was desired to be brought in, and consequently there would be no possible chance to negotiate trade agreements.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator that that is unfortunate, but this is the only opportunity I may have, unless I myself offer an amendment—and being a member of the committee I did not choose to do that—it is the only opportunity I may have to say I want concurring action by the Congress on these agreements.

Mr. GEORGE. Now let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if Congress in the first instance authorizes the negotiation of an agreement and lays down the legislative principles upon which it must be negotiated—that is, if it, in the first instance, authorizes executive agreements and lays down the principles upon which they must be negotiated—why bring it back to Congress to act on it? What use is there in creating additional machinery except for the purpose of having the question studied? Of course I grant that, but that could be done anyway by executive action without any predetermination by the Congress. So we are in the attitude, as I think the Senator must admit, of saying that we have laid down an intelligible legislative declaration of policy and authorized the Executive to negotiate a treaty, but we want to look at the instrument after it is negotiated. Why pass on it twice?

I realize that there are specific things that we would not know are in the agreement; but it seemed to me that if we are going to proceed as now suggested, by bringing the agreement back to the Congress and letting the Congress pass upon the whole thing over again, it is entirely useless, in the first place, to continue the Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. Just a minute.

I appreciate having the views of the Senator from Georgia. Let me say, in part reply to him, that I never voted for the measures authorizing these trade agreements with the intention of permanently surrendering the power of the Congress to negotiate tariff bills.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH. Wait a moment; I have not finished.

Mr. GEORGE. They are all limited in time, absolutely.

Mr. WALSH. I voted for them, as every other person did, as temporary matters. I remember that when the first bill came back to the Senate from the Committee on Finance there was not a 3-year limitation in it, and we put in the 3-year limitation in order to make it an emergency and a temporary policy. That is why it was done; and nobody here at that time ever voted or thought he was voting to take away from Congress for all time the power and the duty and the responsibility of tariff making.

I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in regard to the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] that the treaties agreed to by foreign governments were put into immediate effect and later ratified by the parliaments, I desire to say that that is true; but that is an entirely different situation. The negotiators for foreign governments are agents of the parliaments. In a parliamentary form of government the parliament controls the executive. The executive department is merely the agent of the parliament. So the negotiations were at all times within the control of the parliament, the legislative body, and, being such, in distinction to our form of government, the ratification was simply a pro forma matter.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I also interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator from Georgia, who is usually so accurate, was not entirely accurate when he stated, as I understood him, that these treaties immediately go into provisional effect. For instance, I call his attention to the fact—and I read from a statement by the State Department, which I placed in my speech—that the agreements in one category did not become effective until they had received legislative approval in the foreign country. Such approval has been given by all of the countries, namely, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Finland, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Sweden. The countries in the case of which the agreements did not require legislative ratification were only Belgium, Cuba, and Ecuador. Those in the case of which the agreements became provisionally effective immediately, subject to eventual legislative action, were Canada, Czechoslovakia, France, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom, and Venezuela.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I did not mean that all of them went into effect immediately; but the principal countries, as the Senator has just read, entered into agreements which were immediately effective, but subject to subsequent ratification.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I come now to another aspect of this question. I have participated in the committee work of drafting tariff bills and in the Senate's consideration of three major tariff laws. I think I perceive as clearly as anyone the difficulties which attend tariff making by the Congress. Certainly I hold no brief or make no defense of many tariff rates that have been voted through logrolling and the pressure of private, greedy interests and special groups.

No one can be unmindful of the long and bitter fights in the Congress during the three tariff bills enacted since 1920, especially the struggles between the producers of so-called raw materials and the processors of these materials; between the farmers' claims for protection against industrial tariffs, and the industrials' demands for protection against the cheap wages paid by European competitors; between both the agricultural and industrial producers' demands in disregard of the rights of the unorganized consumers.

But the fact remains that under our form of government the levying of taxes—and a tariff is nothing but a tax—is the function of the Congress.

OPPOSITION TO CONGRESSIONAL METHOD

The history of tariff making demonstrates that there has been an increasing opposition to the methods used and the results obtained by the Congress in tariff revisions. This dissatisfaction became so marked that a Republican President sought, through the flexible provisions of recent tariff laws, to greatly lessen the influence and power of the Congress. The very urging and adoption of the elastic provisions in tariff bills reflected the sentiment of the public throughout the country in opposition to the logrolling, unscientific congressional methods. And under the present administration the same opposition that Republican Presidents expressed, has led to a further lessening of the power and influence of Congress on this subject of advocacy of the reciprocal trade agreement program.

If the Congress of the United States is incompetent, because of diversity of interests, to make tariffs and to pass on reciprocal-trade agreements, let us face the issue and let us submit it to the American people in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, to take this authority and responsibility out of the hands of the Congress and transfer it to the executive branch of the Government. But I am not prepared to take that position or to advocate that course. By the same token I do not propose to attempt to reach the same result by a subterfuge to circumvent the Constitution by indirection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Pardon me. After I finish this statement I shall be glad to yield.

If the issue, therefore, is better economic results to our country by temporarily transferring the tariff-making function to the Executive, we may justify that course now as we did 6 years ago; but I submit that it must rest upon the basis of serious emergency, and for a limited time; it must be a temporary expedient, and not an abandonment of all legislative powers and duties and rights in the levying of taxes.

One remedy for tariff-making inequalities by the Congress would be to empower the President to veto separate items in an omnibus tariff bill which Congress may present to him for his approval. I have long advocated such a change, to accomplish which, of course, would necessitate an amendment to the Constitution. Similarly, the President ought to have power to veto separate items in appropriation bills; and I venture to predict that we shall not make any progress whatever toward real economy in this country under any President until he has such power.

Mr. President, I voted against the amendment of the very able and distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and I will give my reasons. All opponents of the delegation of any authority to the Executive naturally contended for the requirement of Senate ratification by a two-thirds vote, because frankly they see in such a requirement the nullification of the program as a practical matter because of the certainty that under the impulse of partisanship a minority group could block any proposed agreement.

From a strictly legalistic standpoint the question of whether these reciprocal-trade agreements are treaties, within the meaning of the Constitution, is debatable, with precedents to support either position. I have already expressed my own conclusion that it would be unwise, taking all factors into account, to refuse an extension to the Executive of this temporary authority and so feeling, I do not propose to nullify it by a condition which it seems to me would amount to nullification, and therefore not prepared to accept the claim that these are treaties.

CONCURRENCE OF CONGRESS

There is, however, an alternative which, in my judgment, fully meets the needs of the situation and for which there is ample precedent—an excellent Democratic precedent. I refer to a provision in the Underwood tariff law of 1914, which was written by a Democratic majority in the House and in the Senate and is contained in subsection (a) of section 4:

> That for the purpose of readjusting the present duties on importations into the United States and at the same time to encourage the export trade of this country, the President of the United States is authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

Mr. President, if that was good law and a good policy in 1914, why is it not good today? There is only one answer—that the present President of the United States is such a high-minded man, is so deeply concerned and so sincerely interested in this question and the confidence of the people in him is such that he can be trusted, and therefore we ought to surrender legislative approval on that ground and on that basis. Certainly with a Republican President here next January, and with the question before him of not submitting the trade agreements to Congress, I should like to see the roll call on this side of the Chamber, and see what the result would be.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will permit me, I shall be happy to yield to him in just a moment.

Mr. President, I intend to support an amendment to the pending resolution in line with the foregoing Underwood tariff doctrine. This provision—namely, requiring action by the Congress before these trade agreements would become operative—would assure protection to all American interests because the majority of either branch of the Congress would prevent any harmful action under these agreements. Such a provision would fully preserve to the Congress its essential rights and authority, and it would certainly guard against any misuse of the authority which we are delegating to the Executive. At the same time it would not interpose any insurmountable barrier to the taking effect of a reciprocal-trade agreement if it were, in truth and in fact, a desirable one. It would preserve the constitutional right of the legislative branch to deal with tariff duties and would permit the executive branch of the Government to negotiate with other countries through its Department of State, a function which the Congress clearly is not equipped to undertake.

Such a provision, it seems to me, ought to fully satisfy those who are jealous of the prerogatives of Congress and at the same time not to bar the useful services of the Department of State in initiating negotiations for these agreements with foreign countries.

Nineteen of the existing trade agreements which the United States has entered into with other countries have been ratified by the parliaments of these other nations, yet the United States—boasting it is the greatest democracy in the world—under this program has waived its right of review of the Executive's actions. The power to tax is the most important and fundamental of all congressional powers. Without this power there could be no justification for the existence of the Congress. Not to exercise it is a confession that the Congress cannot perform functions that the parliaments of other countries have done satisfactorily.

No emergency, however great, can justify the complete surrender of the taxing powers reposed by the people in their representatives in the Congress. Nor is it justified when an indolent or subservient Congress is willing to surrender its constitutional functions, nor does abuse of this power justify such action. While not prepared to go back to the old system in toto, I am not willing to flout the Constitution.

The requirement for the submission of future agreements to both branches of the Congress, for majority approval, not only meets in a substantial and practical way the objections of those who raise the constitutional question, but also provides a safeguard against the dangers which are inherent in delegating to the Executive unlimited and unrestricted authority to make trade agreements with foreign nations. It is an authority easily open to abuse. If there be no provision for congressional review and approval, it permits the Executive by a stroke of the pen to confer or to withhold trade advantages. It affords a weapon for applying pressures that far transcend any question of trade and commerce.

Furthermore, we must not lose sight of the fact that no man in this Chamber can know today who may be President after the expiration of Mr. Roosevelt's present term. We know how Mr. Roosevelt and Secretary Hull have exercised this authority and how it will continue to be exercised were it to remain in their hands, but we are legislating here for a 3-year extension. These considerations, in my judgment, are an added reason for attaching to the present extension a requirement for the submission to and approval by both Houses of the Congress.

I am glad now to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am always interested in any argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts, because he is always logical and consistent, and I should like to submit a question to him. I agree that the theory he has just advocated is beautiful, a theory which he has attempted to sustain by reading from the Underwood tariff law. But, as a practical matter, it does not seem to me that the provision in the Underwood tariff law was workable, or that the pending amendment would be workable.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question in the most friendly manner?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator believe in Congress permanently surrendering the tariff-making power?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. WALSH. When does the Senator want the power to come back to the Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. I am satisfied with the 3-year period. I do not wish to be technical; if it were 2 years or 4 years, I would feel the same way about it. The pending measure provides for a 3-year term. I do not contend that the 3-year provision is sacred.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator's position.

Mr. NORRIS. It is temporary. The Senator will admit that.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator agrees with me that we never would vote to permanently give this authority to the Executive?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, we would not. The Constitution gives Congress the right to make tariffs, and if my theory is correct, we are not going to give up that jurisdiction by the pending joint resolution. We are still legislating, and we are providing for some instrumentality to carry out our will.

What I wanted particularly to ask the Senator was this question: Notwithstanding what he has read from the Underwood tariff law, notwithstanding the theory under which Congress should be given a vote on the proposal—and I think the amendment is perfectly constitutional, I am not finding fault with it——

Mr. WALSH. I wish the amendment were more restricted in form.

Mr. NORRIS. The thing about it that is detrimental, and which I think will kill the program entirely, and make it unworkable, is that every time an agreement was made there would be thrown into Congress a fight over another tariff bill, amendments might be offered, and the debate might last all summer. If the President made many agreements, Congress would do nothing else but devote all its time to passing on them, and we would thrash out a tariff bill every time an agreement was made.

Mr. WALSH. I had exactly the belief the Senator now entertains, and that was what controlled me, largely, in my vote against the amendment of the able Senator from Nevada. I had the same thoughts that it would be impossible to get action. I do not entertain such thoughts in connection with the pending amendment. I cannot bring myself to feel that this amendment would be destructive. I see myself on sound ground in supporting a move for concurrent action.

The President sends us messages. We approve bills by a majority vote, and they go back for the President's approval. The President will prepare agreements, showing how we can carry on business relations satisfactorily with foreign countries, and he will submit the agreements to us for our approval, just as he sends messages to us. I personally feel that there is no serious objection to getting a majority-vote approval of any agreement which may be submitted that is not generally objectionable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not wish to prolong the discussion——

Mr. WALSH. Nor do I, because I must go to a meeting at half past 4.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of what happened in connection with the 10 Kasson agreements which have been discussed during the whole debate, none of them having come out of the committee, none of them having ever been allowed to get to the floor in either House, they being held in committee, and hearings being held upon them, and all sorts of amendments proposed to each one of them, does the Senator really feel that we would fare any better now with any of the trade agreements going before the committees, with indefinite hearings, allowing everyone who objects to come in and be heard, and then jockeying around as to whether there should be a report from a committee? I am wondering whether we would fare any better now than those supporting the Kasson treaties back in the nineties fared.

Mr. WALSH. Having witnessed recently how cleverly the leader on this side has been able to stop action, I should like to see him seeking to get action. I think he would do it just as cleverly.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is sometimes easier to stop action than to get action.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the leader on our side should recognize the difference between conditions in 1897 and the present. In 1897, Congress was overwhelmingly Republican, and the Foreign Relations Committee was two-thirds Republican at that time. Not only that, but around that period of time there were very high-protectionist Republicans here, if I remember history correctly. I do not think the Senate desired at that time to have any agreements made lowering the tariff. Certainly the conditions now are different. The Democrats in the Senate have a majority of nearly two to one, and apparently we are afraid to trust ourselves in these matters.

With the majority we have in the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the agreements would be referred, if we had had before us an agreement like that with Chile, three-fourths of the committee would have been for it. The Chile treaty has never been objected to by anyone except when there was a proposal to include copper. Copper was not included, as a result of the protests made. If copper had been included, the matter would have gone to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the distinguished Senator from Kentucky would have urged a report notwithstanding the fact that the agreement included copper.

Mr. BARKLEY. Could I have been assured of the support of the distinguished Senator from Nevada if that situation had arisen?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; the Senator would have had the opposition of the Senator from Nevada, and possibly of one other Senator on the committee, but we would have been run over just as a rabbit in the road is run over. There is no question as to what would have happened to us. The matter would have been brought to the floor of the Senate, and in the Senate there would have been seven or eight who would have contended that the duty was not a good one.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Nevada is as agile of foot as is the ordinary rabbit, he would have found methods of escape that would have prevented his being run over.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have seen dead rabbits in the road, and also in this body. [Laughter.] I am quite familiar with such things. I know that such a treaty, including copper, would have been reported by the Senate committee by an overwhelming vote. There might have been 2 against it, and in the Senate there would have been 8 or 10 against it, possibly, but it would have been carried just the same.

I call this to the attention of the Senate merely because we have heard so much about the Kasson treaties not being brought up. They were not brought up because the overwhelming majority of the committee and the overwhelming majority of the Senate never intended that they should be ratified.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I have not quite concluded, if the Senator from Massachusetts will yield further.

Mr. WALSH. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will take a few minutes in my own right.

I have already stated what I believe with regard to the treaty question. The Senator from Massachusetts very frankly admitted that he was more interested in the question of ratification of treaties, either by Congress or the Senate, than in the legal question involved.

While it seems clear to me that these agreements are treaties, I realize, from the very able arguments made by those opposed, that one might very readily take either view of the matter.

Two legal questions have been before the Senate at all times, and they were two separate questions. One of them was the charge that this was an illegal delegation of legislative authority. The other was that these agreements were contracts with foreign governments, with a definite obligation, and therefore treaties which must be ratified by the Senate.

The other side contended that by reason of the delegation of authority to make agreements they were purely executive in their character. In the beginning I contended, although I did not argue the question, that, in my opinion, it was an illegal delegation of authority. I made no extensive argument on that point. I devoted my consideration almost exclusively to the question that these agreements are treaties.

Very briefly I now desire to say what I think about the proposed amendment. In my opinion, it would not make the act constitutional, and whether it is adopted or not, I shall vote against the joint resolution. I think the amendment is entirely legal, and I think no one doubts its legality. No one doubts that the Congress, in delegating authority to an agent, can place such restrictions upon the agent as it sees fit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator conceive that the measure, with the O'Mahoney amendment in it, would grant any authority whatever or delegate any power whatever to the President of the United States? There is nothing on earth now to prevent him from entering into any sort of agreement, without restriction, and raising the tariff duties 100 percent or 200 percent, or wiping them out entirely, and submitting a recommendation to Congress that it pass an act to that effect. It seems to me that the act, with the O'Mahoney amendment in it, would be a limitation, rather than a delegation of power.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think it has anything to do with the question of making treaties. I admit that. I do not think that Congress by any act could change the Constitution of the United States with regard to treaties. But if these agreements are in fact treaties, no matter what they may be called, nothing that Congress could say or do would change that situation. I agree with the Senator from Missouri also that the President could negotiate, without any authority of Congress whatever, every tariff agreement that he is expected to negotiate under this act. The only thing is that if he did make these agreements without the authority of Congress he would not question that they were treaties, and he would send them to the Senate for ratification.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; but with this amendment in the act the legislation would only amount to a recommendation by the President that the Congress enact a certain tariff act. He can do that without any restriction, 50 percent up or 50 percent down. The President can negotiate a reciprocal-trade agreement with a foreign power, and if the Congress then chooses to pass an act which is a tariff act it can do so without this act being on the books at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is exactly the paradoxical position in which Senators place themselves. They say if there was no act at all the President could negotiate these agreements, and if he negotiated them without any act they would have to be ratified by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I did not make myself clear. I said that if the President could negotiate, and then if Congress chose to enact a tariff act putting such an agreement into effect, why of course it would become the law. That is true whether this measure is in effect or not.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is still a peculiar thing about it. Of course, it is admitted that the President has a right to make any agreements with foreign countries he wants to without Congress or anyone else saying a word about it, and if he makes such agreements with foreign countries, they do not become law until they come before the Senate and are ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. By virtue of the fact that Congress enacts a law, therefore, it is not necessary to ratify by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. And yet it is admitted that we cannot make any law affecting treaties. It is a paradoxical position.

Mr. President, I am not debating that question now. That has been settled. There is no doubt that it is perfectly legal for Congress in delegating authority to place any limitations upon the use of that authority it sees fit, just as was done in the measure which bears the name of the late Representative Oscar Underwood. We admit it is perfectly legal. Such limitations might make legal the delegation of authority in this act today, the legality of which is questioned by some. After the very able argument by the Senator from Georgia I can admit that a person must be quite arbitrary to say that there is no question as to the legality of such delegation. But, nevertheless, the Supreme Court has said that Congress cannot delegate legislative authority. The Supreme Court has also held that when sufficient standards are laid down it is not a delegation at all of a legislative authority, but simply an authority to carry out certain legislation as an agent of Congress.

The Senator from Georgia, and I think the majority on this side, believe that it is a legal delegation of authority to carry out the wishes of Congress. I disagree with them. Nevertheless I think it will be admitted—if not, I should like to have someone challenge it—that if the matter did come back to Congress for approval or rejection, then there would be no question of unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority.

So the question comes down to the determination of law and policy. I will admit now, as I admitted to the Senator from Georgia, that this amendment will not cure the defects that my amendment sought to cure. It will not cure the unconstitutional act of the President in making a treaty without ratification by the Senate. The proposed amendment will not satisfy me. I shall vote against the joint resolution because of the defeat of the amendment which I thought was essential to its constitutionality. In view of the very grave doubt with regard to the delegation of this authority to the President, I believe it will be quite wise to adopt an amendment that would cure that unconstitutional delegation of authority, if it is unconstitutional, by providing that the matter shall come back to Congress. I will therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senators who state they are in favor of the principle of the reciprocal-trade agreements and in favor of the principle of the trade-agreements law as a general proposition, but are in favor of the O'Mahoney amendment, are attempting to accomplish the feat heretofore considered impossible, of successfully riding two horses going in opposite directions at the same time. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] a few moments ago said that he was in favor of the principle of the act, but also in favor of the O'Mahoney amendment.

Mr. President, with the O'Mahoney amendment in the act, the act in my opinion will not be worth the paper it is printed on, because it does not give the President any authority whatever; it takes no step whatever toward the accomplishment of the purposes originally set out in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

If the President desires to make a recommendation for a tariff bill, or for specific items in a tariff bill, he possesses that authority at the present time under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me finish my sentence, and then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator was not so considerate of me when I was speaking.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly never interrupted the Senator in the middle of a sentence, either now or at any other time, and if the Senator makes such an assertion I challenge his assertion here and now. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator when I have finished the sentence.

Under the Constitution of the United States the President has the authority to make a recommendation for any change in any tariff schedule that he may see fit to make, or for a general revision of the tariff, with the one limitation as to 50 percent up or 50 percent down. He may make any such recommendation he sees fit, and Congress may enact it into law, and it thus becomes the law of the land.

What the O'Mahoney amendment amounts to is that Congress first sets up a procedure for a change in the tariff structure. The President then goes to work and carries it out, and it again has to come back to Congress for final action.

I now am glad to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, does the Senator see any difference between an original recommendation by the President to Congress for a new tariff and a recommendation, if it may be so called, in the form of an agreement which he has made with a foreign government as a result of the invitation which is contained, as it were, in this act?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I see no difference whatever from the constitutional standpoint.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am not talking about the constitutional point of view. I am talking about the realistic point of view.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not see any practical difference whatever.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say that upon this matter I have exactly the point of view which was expressed a few moments ago by the senior Senator from Massachusetts. I believe that if the President were to send to the Congress an agreement with Great Britain, or with France, or with Italy, or with any other country on the face of the globe, and were to say to the Congress, "This agreement has been negotiated as the result of your invitation; we have gone into the matter of the trade of the two countries fully and in detail," and if then the President said, "We desire your approval of this agreement," the chances are that there would be just as much unanimity of action, as it were, as there is regarding the reorganization plans.

In the present state of world opinion and world affairs I doubt very much whether there would be any serious danger of Congress placing an impediment in the way of approval of such an agreement; but whether or not such an impediment should exist, the fact remains that in the present condition of world commerce and world affairs generally it seems to me impossible to expect that Congress would close its eyes to what is going on in the world, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] so eloquently said "buy a pig in a poke."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No one has suggested that Congress should close its eyes to conditions in the world. As a matter of fact, the whole machinery set up by the act is for the purpose, so far as may be, of enabling the United States to deal with the situation as it exists in the world. I agree with what was said by the chairman of the committee, Mr. HARRISON, in his opening address, that this machinery is a very vital necessity, and may be a very necessary machinery for the maintenance of commercial and economic relations not only during the present period of strife but after the war shall have ended.

I gather the opinion of the Senator from Wyoming from his remarks the other day and again today. Suffice it to say that I do not agree with him. I think we have had enough illustration in the consideration of this very measure to negative the roseate hopes expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. On this very question, in the consideration of the pending measure in a general way, proposals have been advanced in the Senate, and very vigorously supported—by none more enthusiastically than by the Senator from Wyoming—which would single out of the general operation of the act four particular commodities.

Mr. President, if one of these agreements were to come to Congress and start through the mill in the House of Representatives, and then come before the Senate, who can doubt that it would degenerate into a general tariff discussion and a general tariff bill, with all the old methods of logrolling in connection with the Hawley-Smoot Act, the Fordney-McCumber Act, the Dingley Act, and all the other general tariff acts which have been before the Congress? If the President should send one of the agreements to Congress for approval, having to do with numerous items, as it would, who can say that any Senator would feel himself restrained from offering amendments dealing with other commodities, or proposing to raise duties on other commodities?

Mr. President, it seems to me that the proposal to include the O'Mahoney amendment in this measure is simply a proposal to send the measure to the President stripped of all the powers given him for the purposes set forth in the original act. As I said the other day, in connection with the Pittman amendment, it seems to me it would be no more efficacious, although perhaps more candid, to move to strike out the enacting clause of the joint resolution and have it over at once, because I think one method would be as effective as the other in killing the measure.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri if he apprehends any degree of danger in the event that there should be a change of administration, and in the event the new Secretary of State, who would have to administer this law after January 1941, should be wholly in harmony with the point of view of those who were responsible for the logrolling of which he speaks in connection with the Smoot-Hawley Act. Does the Senator think there is any danger in that situation?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I make the same reply to the Senator from Wyoming that was involved in the question which I asked the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I have no such fear and do not regard it as within the realm of anything like reasonable possibility that any foreign power will deliberately seek to negotiate with us to raise tariff barriers against the entry of its goods.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I again interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am not alluding so much to that question as to the possibility that we might have in the Department of State an official and subordinate appointees who might abuse this power. The whole argument of the Senator from Massachusetts was that we have delegated this power to President Roosevelt and to Cordell Hull, because we have known those men, and have had confidence in them that the power would not be abused; but the Senator from Missouri has seen the occasion when Cabinet power in this Government was abused, and not so long ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, Mr. President; and I have seen the occasion, during the very last revision of the tariff by the Congress of the United States, when the measure was under consideration in this very body, when the assistant secretary of the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce was introduced into the Finance Committee of the Senate as one of its confidential agents and clerks, there to participate in all the secret and confidential discussions which took place with reference to fixing rates. I do not believe there is likely to be a more flagrant or more outrageous exhibition under the system authorized by this measure than there has been in connection with the manipulation of tariff bills and their passage through the Congress in the past.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me cite to the Senator the history of the Underwood Tariff Act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am very familiar with it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator say there was no logrolling in the passage of that tariff measure? Will the Senator say there was no abuse of the legislative process in that instance?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Undoubtedly there was logrolling in the passage of the Underwood Tariff Act; and I think every Senator who was a Member of Congress at that time will bear me out. I do not mean to say that there was any abuse of legislative power; but any one who has ever observed the passage of a general tariff bill through the Congress knows that there has been logrolling in connection with every one of them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator was discussing the abuse of legislative power.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was taking up the phrase used by the Senator from Wyoming and applying it to a particular situation which existed in the Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I happened to be a Member of the House of Representatives when the Underwood tariff bill was debated and voted upon, and even when it was prepared. I can say that logrolling ran rife in the House at that time. It became a stench in the nostrils of all those who were really in favor of reducing the tariff at that time. The Underwood Tariff Act was a distinct disappointment to those of us who believed in an honest reduction of the tariff.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I remember it very well. I was not a Member of the House, but I was Parliamentarian of the House, and I had the opportunity to observe that logrolling went on to the fullest extent.

Mr. McKELLAR. One further thought: However dangerous it might be for us to have a Republican administration, and however dangerous might be its use of the powers incident to the authority to make trade agreements, does not the Senator agree with me that it would be tenfold more dangerous to undergo the logrolling incident to another tariff bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I have not the faintest doubt about it. It is for that reason that I voted for the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act when it was originally passed in 1934. I voted for its extension in 1937, and I intend to vote for its extension tomorrow, I hope, because I think no one in this Chamber who is familiar with my record in even the slightest degree will charge me with ever having been unduly willing to delegate legislative power to anybody at any time. I voted against the N. R. A. I voted against the first A. A. A. I voted against a great many other measures because I felt that they were unconstitutional delegations of power. However, under the precedents laid down by the laws of this country, I felt that this was a constitutional delegation of power, and I thought it was the only way in which we could escape from the old, vicious, venal, disgraceful logrolling days of general tariff bills.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. DANAHER. If the Senator will bear with me, I have not been able to study this question as much as I had hoped. I was not a Member of Congress when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was enacted, but I have heard references to it on the floor during the past week and again from the Senator this afternoon. Has the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act ever been repealed?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It has not, except insofar as it has been affected by reciprocal-trade agreements.

Mr. DANAHER. The thought that is going through my mind is that if it has been such an iniquity as it has been represented to be, it seems to me that the opportunity to repeal it has existed almost daily for the past 9 or 10 years, during which time the administration has had overwhelming control of both Senate and House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am very glad, indeed, that the Senator from Connecticut asked that question, because it involves the reason for the procedure set out in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

The Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act was merely the successor and capsheaf of a series of iniquitous tariff measures; but it was that particular measure more than any other which culminated in the policy of retaliation, which led practically every other nation in the world to enact retaliatory legislation against our laws, to paralyze our foreign trade, and to shut American goods out of its markets.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator if he will permit me to conclude what I am about to say. Having by our bad example—particularly in the Hawley-Smoot tariff law—created the system of retaliatory tariffs throughout the world, and having driven Great Britain off her free-trade policy and caused her to impose tariffs against our raw products and our goods, we had no assurance that the other nations were likely to follow the good example which we set when we started to reduce tariffs and correct some of the iniquities created by the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. That result could only be the product of agreement. We had created the situation, but we had created a situation which we could not correct by ourselves. Therefore negotiation was necessary; and since congresses or parliaments cannot directly conduct negotiations, this method was the only method that seemed feasible for dealing with the situation created by the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. Am I justified, then, in drawing the conclusion that the real purpose of the reciprocal trade agreements program, and the real purpose sought to be achieved by extending it for another 3 years, is to repudiate, by implication at least, the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the real purpose is precisely the purpose set forth and repeatedly stated in the act itself—to increase the foreign trade of the United States, to increase domestic prosperity in the United States by increasing our commerce with other nations, and by correcting, as far as may be, the situation which has been created not only by our bad example but by the nations which followed our bad example in the retaliatory tariff program.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DANAHER. Would not a much simpler way to achieve that purpose have been simply to repeal the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It would not, for the reason that other nations had passed prohibitive tariff laws against us; and unless we negotiated with them in advance, we had no assurance whatever that when we modified our laws they would modify theirs.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. From the Senator's discussion of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act I gather that the real thing which was highly objectionable was the fact that too many reciprocal-trade agreements were made in the Halls of Congress rather than, as now, in the halls of the State Department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Some of them, I think, were made outside the Halls of Congress. There were numerous notorious lobbies here. The Senator from Connecticut rather took exception to my reference to the presence of the representative of the Connecticut Manufacturers' Association in the Finance Committee. I simply call his attention to the fact that the Senate of the United States censured a Senator from Connecticut for introducing that lobbyist into the Finance Committee.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for an observation?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. As I gathered from reading the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], it provides that each reciprocal-trade agreement as a whole shall be submitted to the Congress to vote "yes" or "no" on the agreement, just as if it were a treaty; that it would not be open to amendment. That is my understanding of the Senator's amendment. In other words, it would not open the way for logrolling.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the first place, as I read the amendment, it does not say what the Senator from Colorado says it does. In the second place, under the Constitution of the United States, each House may make whatever rules it pleases to govern its proceedings; and the question whether or not the agreement is open to amendment is a matter to be judged by each House under its own rules.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; but I say to the Senator that here is an agreement which has been signed by the Secretary of State under the authority of Congress, and has been signed by the representatives of the foreign government. It comes here, as I see it, under that authority, with the question, Shall this agreement which has been entered into be approved or not? We could not by amendment change the agreement. That is, the agreement would have to be resubmitted to the other party to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We do that with treaties. We frequently put reservations in treaties.

Mr. ADAMS. A reservation is a very different thing. We could not amend the treaty itself without its going back for the approval of the other party.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I did not for a moment suggest that we could bind the other party; but I entirely disagree with the Senator from Colorado that the agreement would have to be voted up or voted down, that we should have to vote "yes" or vote "no" on the agreement, because I do not think that is true under the rules of either body; and while the Senate would have a right to adopt such a rule, I do not think it would be valid under the Constitution of the United States, or binding on either House, if such a rule were adopted.

Mr. ADAMS. If my recollection is correct, the Senator and I both voted for the Wheeler amendment to the Reorganization Act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I voted for it.

Mr. ADAMS. Would it be possible to frame an amendment of that kind which would specifically limit the action of Congress to a vote for or against the reciprocal-trade agreement, providing, as the Wheeler amendment did, that it should be voted upon within a particular time, so that there could be no filibuster against it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator will have to apply his own ingenuity to that problem. I also voted against the Reorganization Act.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator would have no objection to that type of amendment; would he?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I would have objection to it, because I am in favor of the joint resolution.

Mr. ADAMS. I am surprised.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Is it not true that in the consideration of the Wheeler amendment it was conceded by every one—as I recollect, I asked the question of the Senator from Colorado—that one Congress could not bind the next Congress, and that, while the Wheeler amendment might have in it some provision of that kind, if the next Congress wanted to make its rules in such a way as to provide for amendments to reorganization recommendations the next Congress could do it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not understand that there was the slightest dispute between any parties to the discussion of the Wheeler amendment as to the soundness of the proposition just stated by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the Wheeler amendment attached a condition to the going into effect of a reorganization. Of course a subsequent Congress could provide for another reorganization, but this Congress could provide a condition which must be complied with before a reorganization plan submitted to it should become effective. We can attach a condition to the going into effect of a reciprocal trade agreement, not a condition involving the operation of definite legislative procedure. We could provide, if we saw fit, that it should not go into effect unless approved by the Comptroller of the Currency. We can attach any condition; and it seems to me the O'Mahoney amendment is of that character.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in short I may say that; in my opinion, the O'Mahoney amendment, like the Pittman amendment, and like the amendment of the Senator from Colorado—which is the most ingenious of any of them—is simply a measure designed to kill the joint resolution, or at least its adoption would have the effect of killing the joint resolution. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado, which I assume will be next considered, is, as I say, the most ingenious of any of them, because the Senator's amendment provides for a delegation of power to one branch of the Congress instead of to the whole Congress; and that is a proposition on which the House of Representatives would not even go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], as modified.

Mr. BROWN obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Several Senators have spoken to some of us on this side on the subject of an agreement to vote. Is it possible to obtain a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on this amendment tonight?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Numerous statements have been made to me that several Senators desire to speak upon this amendment; and I have also learned that some pairs which were made upon the Pittman amendment to protect absent Senators do not apply to the present amendment. In view of the circumstances, therefore, the Senator will realize that there is a slight obstacle to an immediate agreement.

I have not been able to get all the information I should like to have to determine what would be the advisable thing to do. I should very much like to see that Senators who are unavoidably detained and who support this amendment will be protected in their votes as they desire. I am doing my best to make inquiry into that matter, but until I get my answers I shall not be in position to agree to a vote tonight. I think it might be possible to work out an agreement for a vote at some time tomorrow, because I rather imagine that these doubts will have cleared away by that time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan will further yield, I may say that the Senator from Wyoming appreciates that every courtesy has been extended in this matter.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do, indeed, and I am very grateful.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] will appreciate, I think, that when certain Senators telegraphed here with reference to pairs, and they could be obtained, we obtained them for them; and it was expressly stated that the pairs were on the Pittman amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I dislike very much to see this matter just go along, with all the opportunity that has been available for Senators who wanted pairs to arrange the pairs before this time.

My thought is not to have Senators inconvenienced by continuing the session indefinitely tonight, and then, as I have seen so often, some Senator, about 8 o'clock, moving to adjourn and the Senate adjourning. I was wondering whether we could get a vote tonight.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I could not grant my consent to taking a vote tonight until I have obtained the information which I am seeking to obtain now with respect to the absent Senators to whom I have referred.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator want us to provide him with pairs for Senators who are not here?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like very much to see that protection is granted them.

Mr. HARRISON. A few days ago, when the result was somewhat uncertain on a very close vote, that privilege was not accorded to us.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I had nothing to do with that.

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator had no more to do with it than anyone else, except that he just happened to be on the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was not aware of what happened in that regard.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Could we not enter into an agreement to vote tomorrow, with a limitation on debate?

Mr. HARRISON. That was my object in making the inquiry. I am perfectly willing, if we cannot get a vote tonight, to ask for a limitation of debate tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. To have speeches limited to 15 minutes, commencing at 12 o'clock, or something like that.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is satisfactory to the leader on this side, it is satisfactory to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the uncertainty of getting a vote tonight, I think that is probably the best arrangement we can make.

Mr. HARRISON. Could the Senate meet a little earlier tomorrow morning?

Mr. McNARY. I think not, because there are important matters before the Committee on Appropriations. Frankly, I must be there.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Michigan permit me to submit a request?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that beginning tomorrow, immediately following the approval of the Journal of today, on the amendment now pending, or any substitute therefor or amendment offered to it, and not including the joint resolution itself, debate shall be limited to one speech to a Senator, and that no Senator shall speak longer than 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to know whether the Senator intends to include the joint resolution and amendments for the period of the pendency of the pending amendment, or any substitute. In other words, so that it may be understood, does the unanimous-consent agreement provide for a limitation of 15 minutes to each Senator while the pending amendment or any substitute is pending, regardless of whether he speaks on the amendment or on the joint resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. I thought that was the way I submitted the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I know that if this unanimous-consent agreement is entered into the Chamber will immediately empty. I wanted to make a few observations upon the pending amendment and to get what assistance I could from various Senators who I suppose may interrupt me, because my mind is not fully made up on the question. I am open-minded on the O'Mahoney amendment. I should be willing to agree to the proposed unanimous-consent arrangement, if I might have a matter of 30 minutes tomorrow morning.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I amend the request I have submitted so that it will provide that after the Senator from Michigan has been recognized the first thing tomorrow, following the approval of the Journal, he may be given 30 minutes, and that following that, on the pending amendment or any substitute or amendment to it, each speech shall be limited to 15 minutes, and that no Senator shall be permitted to speak more than once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Michigan, who now has the floor, will be allowed 30 minutes in the morning.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then let everyone else have 30 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. The only reason for making the exception was that the Senator from Michigan has the floor and had desired to speak tonight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the request, and ask that the Senate remain in session tonight. Let us proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I am very sorry the unanimous-consent arrangement could not be made, because I would have liked to address myself to the Senate at a time when the vote was about to be taken. But inasmuch as we are unable to enter into the agreement, I will proceed this evening with the few remarks I have to make.

I wish first to address myself to the answer made by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to an assertion by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. The Senator from Massachusetts stated that in the event there were in office a Secretary of State or a President unfavorably disposed to the reciprocal-trade agreements, in all likelihood our tariff rates would be increased. The Senator from Missouri replied to that by stating that such a condition could not become effective unless the Secretary of State or the President were able to get the other countries parties to the agreements to consent to higher tariff duties with respect to them.

Mr. President, I think that the statement made by the Senator from Missouri was entirely erroneous. I believe it can be demonstrated that if we had a President or a Secretary of State who was unfavorably disposed toward the trade treaties, 17 of the 20 effective treaties could be immediately abrogated and 3 others could be abrogated by July 1, 1941. Why do I make that assertion? Because 17 of the treaties have already run the 3-year period, or the 2-year period, as provided in some cases. Upon the happening of that event, the 50-percent increase which is permitted by the Smoot-Hawley Act, which, of course, is still in effect, could be placed in effect by the action of the Executive.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that beginning at 12:30 p. m. tomorrow no Senator shall speak more than once, or longer than 15 minutes on the pending amendment, or, during the pendency of the amendment, on any amendment thereto or substitute therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. McNARY. It is understood the agreement does not apply to the joint resolution?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was that the proposed unanimous-consent agreement should not apply to the joint resolution.

Mr. BROWN. I take it that upon the conclusion of the ordinary preliminaries tomorrow I will be recognized to speak until 12:45.

Mr. BARKLEY. Until 12:30.

Mr. BROWN. And I will have 15 minutes of my own time after 12:30?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MICHIGAN CIVIL-SERVICE LAW AND THE HATCH ACT

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I wish to change the subject rather rapidly and make an observation or two in regard to the Hatch Act.

The most distinguished political scientist of the State of Michigan is Prof. James K. Pollock, who is one of the ranking members of the faculty of the University of Michigan, the department of political science. On March 28 he wrote me a letter which I should like to read after a brief introductory statement.

Professor Pollock was chosen by ex-Governor Fitzgerald of Michigan to head the commission which drafted the first Michigan Civil Service Act. Governor Fitzgerald was defeated in 1936, and was succeeded by Frank Murphy, now Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Professor Pollock was continued in his position by Governor Murphy, and presented to the legislature controlled by the Democratic Party a Civil Service Act which affected 17,000 employees of the State of Michigan.

In the campaign of 1938 that Civil Service Act was the subject of considerable controversy. Governor Fitzgerald pledged to the people of Michigan that he would not materially change the Democratic civil-service law. Unfortunately for the State, Governor Fitzgerald died in March following his induction into office on January 1, 1939. Immediately those who were interested in sabotaging the Michigan Civil Service Act went to work on the legislature, and upon the Lieutenant Governor who succeeded Governor Fitzgerald, and the result was the complete emasculation of the Civil Service Act which was held up throughout the United States as a model of its kind.

I think that is somewhat prophetic as to what may happen to the Hatch Act which is already law, and to the somewhat similar measure which is now pending in the House of Representatives if it should be passed. If the Republicans obtain control of the Congress of the United States, and if they adopt the same attitude that was adopted by the Republicans in the State of Michigan, there will not be any Hatch Pure Politics act, so called.

Professor Pollock, and many members of the faculty of the University of Michigan, which is a very large institution, and which has contributed more Members to the Senate and to the House than any other institution of learning in the United States, interested themselves in an attempt to defeat the sabotage of the so-called Civil Service Act. They were unsuccessful.

We talk about the school man in politics in connection with the Hatch Act. It is interesting to note that after the legislature had sabotaged the Michigan civil-service law, one Melville B. McPherson, a prominent politician in the State of Michigan, went before the faculty of Michigan State College, an institution of 6,000 students, about half the size of our State university, and told the faculty members that because Professor Pollock and his colleagues in the Department of Political Science in the University of Michigan had interested themselves in an attempt to stop the repeal of the Civil Service Act, the University of Michigan had been penalized by taking $1,000,000 of its appropriation away from it.

Mr. President, there is an example of a school man in politics. Was it right, or was it wrong for this citizen to respond to the request of the Governor, the Republican Governor, and the Democratic Governor of my State, to assist in the establishment of a civil-service law? Was it proper for him to attempt to defeat the politicians who tried, and who succeeded in killing the Michigan public-service law? Of course, it was. These politicians penalized him by taking $1,000,000 from the appropriation granted the University of Michigan, and then went before the faculties of other great institutions and threatened them by saying, "You acted all right. You kept out of this controversy." But because these three men in the political science department of the University followed the request of the two Governors and attempted to bring about the enactment of a good law, the university with which they are connected, our great State university, was penalized $1,000,000.

Let me read to the Senate what a distinguished newspaperman editorially said respecting it:

[Royal Oak Tribune]

THE PROFESSORS WARNED

If there are any Republicans who are still wondering why we have had a New Deal in Washington for the last 7 years, they have only to read the words of Melville B. McPherson, Republican member of the State board of agriculture, when he spoke to the faculty club at Michigan State College recently.

Mr. McPherson told Michigan State College professors not to "get out on thin ice" as those at the University of Michigan had. The crime committed by the latter was "taking part in debatable public questions."

The boss of the State supervisors' organization (for he is that as well as chairman of the State tax commission and member of the State board of agriculture) got right down to cases. He told the teachers what they could and could not do if they wanted to avoid irking the politicians.

He declared that the legislature had cut the university's requested appropriations $1,000,000, primarily because of the legislature's antagonism to a few members of the university's staff "who were supporting measures to which 90 percent of the legislature were opposed."

It seems to me that the average resident of Michigan would like to have its college professors, or any other men with training and expert knowledge, use their ability to improve our governmental system. But Mr. McPherson is of the old school which thinks otherwise.

These highfalutin professors can keep their noses out of such practical matters as what kind of government we have—or else. The "or else" is very plainly insinuated by the boss supervisor.

If the professors do not consent to be gagged by the politicians, they will find the work of their universities sadly handicapped because the politicians will not vote the necessary funds.

This sounds more like a ukase from Hitler or Stalin. It does not have the ring of democracy. It is thoroughly disgusting to those who had hoped that the Republican Party had learned something by being put over the bumps.

When politicians dominate American education and educators, we will be in a very bad way.

Mr. President, Professor Pollock was called by the distinguished senior Senator from North Dakota to come here and advise his committee on means and methods of cleaning up elections. He says in his letter:

I must say that as a close student of the whole problem of money in elections, in my opinion this partisan patchwork known as the Hatch Act is a very inadequate and unsatisfactory method of dealing with a great national problem.

Mr. President, at this point as a part of my remarks I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN,
Ann Arbor, March 28, 1940.

The Honorable PRENTISS M. BROWN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have followed very closely the debates in the Senate on the so-called Hatch Act and I have been exceedingly gratified to note particularly on pages 2618–2622 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the part of your remarks which dealt with educational institutions. I am writing to thank you personally for this comment of yours, and for later being able to amend the act in such a way as to cut out the objectionable provisions. I know the importance of your amendment and I am very happy that the Senator from my State responded so sympathetically on such an important matter.

I am enclosing a clipping which you may or may not have seen, which deals with the same kind of attempted intimidation and violation of academic freedom as indulged in by one of our State politicians. I find the danger to academic freedom to be very real and I therefore especially appreciate your recognition of the importance of protecting it. I hope the House will not change the provision.

I must say that as a close student of the whole problem of money in elections, in my opinion this partisan patchwork known as the Hatch Act is a very inadequate and unsatisfactory method of dealing with a great national problem. What we need is a thoroughgoing Election Expenditures Act similar to the one I prepared for the Nye committee years ago known as S. 366, Seventy-fifth Congress, first session. And if the Congress wants to eliminate political activity by Government officials, why don't they put them in the classified service by passing the Ramspeck bill? Then such employees are automatically prohibited from political activity.

With kindest regards.

Sincerely,

JAMES K. POLLOCK.

Mr. BROWN. I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD that part of the statement contained in the Detroit News of February 9, 1940, made by Mr. W. K. Kelsey, relating to this subject matter; and the editorial in the same newspaper, entitled "He Served the Public."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Detroit News of February 9, 1940]

THE COMMENTATOR

(By W. K. Kelsey)

Maybe Melville B. McPherson wasn't talking about Dr. James K. Pollock when he told the Michigan State College Faculty Club that the legislature cut the University of Michigan's appropriation $1,000,000 "primarily because of the legislature's antagonism to a few members of the University's staff who were supporting measures to which 90 percent of the legislators were opposed." But it makes little difference whether he was or not, for his remarks were just plain silly.

Dr. Pollock was drafted by Governor Fitzgerald to head a committee to study civil-service methods and draft a civil-service bill for Michigan. The Governor chose him for the simple reason that Dr. Pollock probably knew more about the operation of civil-service laws than any other man in Michigan. The committee drafted a bill, which was passed by the legislature during Governor Murphy's administration. Two years later the present legislature gutted that law, Governor Dickinson consenting. Naturally, Dr. Pollock defended the act of which he was the principal author. If the legislature, as Mr. McPherson perhaps suggests, penalized the University on that score, the people of Michigan may count it as just one of the dirty, incompetent acts of a reactionary body, in which the majority lifted its own selfishness and desire for spoliation above the interests of the people they misrepresented.

When legislation is proposed, what is more natural than to call in, to prepare it, men who know something about it? What is more natural than that such men be found in the colleges, where there are specialists in such matters? The State is paying the salaries of such men; must it be debarred from making use of their knowledge? Yes; says Mr. McPherson. Such men should be cloistered; they should teach theory, but never engage in practice, for fear they will bring their institutions into disrepute. With whom? The legislature. Well, to be in disrepute with this legislature is to have received an accolade.

[From Detroit (Mich.) News of February 9, 1940]

HE SERVED THE PUBLIC

Melville B. McPherson's criticism of the University of Michigan for permitting its professors to take part in "debatable public questions" was a shrewd bit of intimidation.

McPherson recently was named a member of the State Board of Agriculture. He addressed his remarks to the faculty of Michigan State College, expressing the hope that they would not fall into the grievous errors afflicting the Ann Arbor institution. The legislature of late, he said, has been more than ever impressed with the merits of the State College and, he intimated, has allowed its favor to be reflected in the appropriations for education.

The implication plainly was conveyed that both institutions will best serve their financial welfare by conforming their ideas to McPherson's. Nor would this be taken as an idle threat, for the Kent County politician has devoted himself to maintaining a State machine quite capable on occasion of influencing legislation. His activity in opposing legislation to guard relief against political manipulation was the most recent manifestation of his role in that connection.

Those who heard McPherson's speech to the State College faculty gained the impression his disapproval of the university centered largely on Prof. James K. Pollock. Dr. Pollock was chairman of the late Governor Fitzgerald's Civil Service Study Commission, which reported realistically on the evils of spoils politics in the State and later drafted the first model civil-service bill. Still later he cooperated with the Michigan Merit System Association in advocating enactment of this bill and in opposing the "ripper law" which eventually supplanted it.

Dr. Pollock's distinguished service of the State earned him the enmity of its coterie of machine politicians in both parties. It is hoped no ill will come to him through McPherson, whose services have been of an entirely different order.

Mr. HATCH rose.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, before I yield to the Senator from New Mexico I simply wish to state that I place these matters in the RECORD and make this statement because I think it shows what can happen and what will happen to an act such as the one which bears his name and which I know was conceived by the Senator from New Mexico, by the Senator from Georgia, and others, with the best intention, but which gains its main support from an opposition party whose purpose is to circumscribe the particular party that happens to be in political power at the time, and which is most injured by the measure.

I also placed these matters in the RECORD, Mr. President, because I hope they will be read by the members of the Judiciary Committee of the House, who are considering this matter now, with especial reference to their determination of the educational amendment which I offered, and which was adopted by the Senate when the Hatch Act was passed.

I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I merely wish to say to the Senator from Michigan that the incidents he relates with respect to the repeal of the civil-service act in Michigan and the attempted intimidation of professors in institutions of learning in his State are exactly the things against which we are fighting with this type of legislation.

Mr. BROWN. I know the Senator has that thought in mind.

Mr. HATCH. Referring to the letter from Professor Pollock, I am quite familiar with his writings. At this moment I have on my desk excerpts from some of his writings on the Corrupt Practices Act, dealing with the subject of campaign expenditures, on which subject the professor has written rather extensively. I have always found his ideas very interesting. His statement that the legislation referred to is inadequate is no different from the statement I have made many times. I have said it is not a complete job, but at least it goes part of the way. I want to go all the way; and I hope that the Judiciary Committee of the House will consider these remarks as well, and report the bill, as I understand it is about to do rather shortly.

Mr. BROWN. Incidently, in that connection I hope the Senator from New Mexico will follow the usual custom of the Senate, and when he goes into conference will fight just as hard for the educational amendment—which was adopted by a large majority in the Senate—as he does for the other provisions in the bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment further?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I shall try to uphold the bill passed by the Senate. I shall consider that my purpose.

I wish to say further, that, from the editorial which the Senator has read, and from what he has said as to the action of the Republican Party in the State of Michigan, I think it is very likely that the people of the State of Michigan will have an opportunity to express their disapproval of that sort of conduct.

Mr. BROWN. I join the Senator in that hope.

Mr. HATCH. If the Republican Party should obtain control of national affairs and repeal this legislation, as the Senator suggests, I am inclined to think that, at the first opportunity, the people would express their disapproval of such action.

Mr. BROWN. I hope they will not have the opportunity.

Mr. HATCH. I join the Senator in that hope.

AMBASSADOR BULLITT'S SPEECH AT BORDEAUX, FRANCE

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, yesterday I made some observations in reference to Mr. Welles and Mr. Bullitt, our Ambassador to France. During the course of those remarks I stated that I was desirous of obtaining a copy of an address which was delivered by Ambassador Bullitt on September 3, 1938, at Bordeaux, France, at a convention of wine merchants, I believe. I stated at that time that I would read the address of Mr. Bullitt on the floor of the Senate. As the result of my desire so to do, I requested the State Department to send me a copy of his address, and was advised at that time that his remarks were purely extemporaneous, but that the Department could provide me with the closing remarks of the address, which the Department very kindly sent me.

In all fairness to Mr. Bullitt, our Ambassador to France, I desire to have published in the RECORD at this juncture a letter which I have received from the State Department, signed by Mr. M. J. McDermott, of whom I made the request. This letter provides me with the closing remarks of Mr. Bullitt in his extemporaneous address at Bordeaux on September 3, 1938.

Without objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 2, 1940.

The Honorable ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR REYNOLDS: In compliance with your request over the telephone, I am glad to give you the following information concerning Ambassador Bullitt's speech at Bordeaux on September 3, 1938.

The Department of State has the text of the pertinent remarks of the Ambassador upon that occasion which he made reading from a manuscript, copies of which were given to journalists who were present at the banquet. His remarks were as follows:

"It is no secret that the people of the United States today feel for the people of France the most profound sympathy. We are united by our devotion to liberty, democracy, and peace. We are united by our old friendship, by the aid that each has brought to the other in an hour of need. Today we are working together to preserve peace. May we be as successful in that task as we have been in the past when we have marched together under the flags of war."

Upon that occasion the Associated Press carried a misquotation of Ambassador Bullitt's remarks, which they subsequently corrected in the afternoon newspapers of September 12, as follows:

"Interpretations of United States Ambassador William C. Bullitt's speech at Bordeaux, France, September 3, attributing to him the statement that France and the United States were 'indefectively united in war as in peace' were withdrawn yesterday by newspapermen who reported them.

"Among these was the Bordeaux correspondent, who dictated the phrase to the Paris bureau of the Associated Press and later insisted upon the accuracy of his report. The correspondent said there had been a misinterpretation of the words the Ambassador actually pronounced.

"The passage that led to the correspondent's confusion was: 'Today we are working together to preserve peace. May we be as successful in that task as we have been in the past when we marched together under the flags of war.'"

Sincerely yours,

M. J. MCDERMOTT.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In view of the fact that the Ambassador employed the word "war" in his address, I ask that at this juncture in my remarks there be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the observations made by the Honorable Claud Kitchin, of North Carolina, on April 5, 1917. Let me add, Mr. President, that day after tomorrow, April 5, 23 years will have expired since the United States of America entered the World War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the remarks of Representative Kitchin will be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks are as follows:

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the many assumptions of loyalty and patriotism on the part of some of those who favor the resolution, and insinuations by them of cowardice and disloyalty on the part of those who oppose it—offshoots, doubtless, of a passionate moment—let me at once remind the House that it takes neither moral nor physical courage to declare a war for others to fight. [Applause.] It is evidence of neither loyalty nor patriotism for one to urge others to get into a war when he knows that he himself is going to keep out.

The depth of my sorrow, the intensity of my distress in contemplating the measureless step proposed, God only knows. The right and necessity of this momentous resolution are addressed to the individual judgment of the Members of the House. Too grave is the responsibility for anyone to permit another to stand sponsor for his conscience.

Profoundly impressed with the gravity of the situation, appreciating to the fullest the penalties which a war-mad moment will impose, my conscience and judgment, after mature thought and fervent prayer for rightful guidance, have marked out clearly the path of my duty, and I have made up my mind to walk it, if I go barefooted and alone. [Applause.] I have come to the undoubting conclusion that I should vote against this resolution. [Applause.] If I had a single doubt, I would with profoundest pleasure resolve it in favor of the view of the administration and of a large majority of my colleagues, who have so recently honored me with their confidence. I know that I shall never criticize any Member for advocating this resolution. I concede—I feel—that he casts his vote in accordance with sincere conviction. I know, too, that for my vote I shall be not only criticized but denounced from one end of the country to the other. The whole yelping pack of defamers and revilers in the Nation will at once be set upon my heels.

My friends, I cannot leave my children lands and riches—I cannot leave them fame—but I can leave them the name of an ancestor, who, mattering not the consequences to himself, never dared to hesitate to do his duty as God gave him to see it. [Applause.]

Half the civilized world is now a slaughterhouse for human beings. This Nation is the last hope of peace on earth, good will toward men. I am unwilling for my country by statutory command to pull up the last anchor of peace in the world and extinguish during the long night of a world-wide war the only remaining star of hope for Christendom. I am unwilling by my vote today for this Nation to throw away the only remaining compass to which the world can look for guidance in the paths of right and truth, of justice and humanity, and to leave only force and blood to chart hereafter the path of mankind to tread.

By passage of this resolution we enter the war, and the universe becomes one vast drama of horrors and blood—one boundless stage upon which will play all the evil spirits of earth and hell. All the demons of inhumanity will be let loose for a rampage throughout the world. Whatever be the future, whatever be the rewards or penalties of this Nation's step, I shall always believe that we could and ought to have kept out of this war.

Great Britain every day, every hour, for 2 years has violated American rights on the seas. We have persistently protested. She has denied us not only entrance into the ports of the Central Powers but has closed to us by force the ports of neutrals. She has unlawfully seized our ships and our cargoes. She has rifled our mails. She has declared a war zone sufficiently large to cover all the ports of her enemy. She made the entire North Sea a military area—strewed it with hidden mines and told the neutral nations of the world to stay out or be blown up. We protested. No American ship was sunk, no American life was destroyed, because we submitted and did not go in. We kept out of war. We sacrificed no honor. We surrendered permanently no essential rights. We knew that these acts of Great Britain, though in plain violation of international law and of our rights on the seas, were not aimed at us. They were directed at her enemy. They were inspired by military necessity. Rather than plunge this country into war, we were willing to forego for the time our rights. I approved that course then; I approve it now.

Germany declares a war zone sufficiently large to cover the ports of her enemy. She infests it with submarines and warns the neutral world to stay out, though in plain violation of our rights and of international law. We know that these acts are aimed not directly at us but intended to injure and cripple her enemy, with which she is in a death struggle.

We refuse to yield; we refuse to forego our rights for the time. We insist upon going in.

In my judgment, we could keep out of the war with Germany as we kept out of the war with Great Britain, by keeping our ships and our citizens out of the war zone of Germany as we did out of the war zone of Great Britain. And we would sacrifice no more honor, surrender no more rights in the one case than in the other. Or we could resort to armed neutrality, which the President recently urged and for which I voted on March 1.

But we are told that Germany has destroyed American lives while Great Britain destroyed only property. Great Britain destroyed no American lives, because this Nation kept her ships and her citizens out of her war zone which she sowed with hidden mines.

But we are quite sure that the real reason for war with Germany is the destruction of lives as distinguished from property, that to avenge the killing of innocent Americans and to protect American lives war becomes a duty.

Mexican bandits raided American towns, shot to death sleeping men, women, and children in their own homes. We did not go to war to avenge these deaths. We sent an armed expedition into Mexico to hunt down and punish the bandits. Away out from the American border the soldiers of Carranza, of the Mexican Government, which we had recognized, met our soldiers, shot the American flag from the hands of an American soldier, shot down to the death our soldiers, and Carranza, instead of disavowing the dastardly act, defiantly approved and ratified it. Yet we did not go to war to avenge the destruction of American lives and the insult and assault on the American flag. We were willing to forego our rights rather than plunge this country into war while half the world was in conflagration. I approved that course then; I approve it now.

Why can we not, why should we not, forego for the time being the violation of our rights by Germany, and do as we did with Great Britain, do as we did with Mexico, and thus save the universe from being wrapped in the flames of war?

I have hoped and prayed that God would forbid our country going into war with another for doing that which perhaps under the same circumstances we ourselves would do.

Are we quite sure that in a war with Germany or Japan, if our fleet was bottled up, helpless, and our ships of commerce had been swept from the seas, all our ports closed by the enemy's fleet, imports of fuel and food and clothing for our people and ammunition for our soldiers were denied, with our very life trembling in the balance, we would not, in the last struggle for existence, strike our enemy with the only weapon of the sea remaining, though in violation of international law? Would one contend that under the circumstances our submarine commanders should permit the landing at the ports of the enemy arms and ammunition with which to shoot down our brave American boys when they had it in their power to prevent it? Would we demand of our submarine commanders that they give the benefit of the doubt to questions of international law rather than to the safety of our country and the lives of our soldiers?

War upon the part of a nation is sometimes necessary and imperative. But here no invasion is threatened. Not a foot of our territory is demanded or coveted. No essential honor is required to be sacrificed. No fundamental right is asked to be permanently yielded or suspended. No national policy is contested. No part of our sovereignty is questioned. Here the overt act, ruthless and brutal though it be, is not aimed directly at us. The purpose of the proposed enemy is not our injury, either in property or life. The whole aim and purpose and effort are directed at a powerful enemy with which she is in a life and death struggle.

The causes for which we are now asked to declare war could have been given with equal—yea, greater—force 30 days or 10 days after the first step taken by the German Army in its march toward Paris. They existed then.

The House and the country should thoroughly understand that we are asked to declare war not to protect alone American lives and American rights on the high seas. We are to make the cause of Great Britain, France, and Russia, right or wrong, our cause. We are to make their quarrel, right or wrong, our quarrel. We are to help fight out, with all the resources in men, money, and credit of the Government and its people, a difference between the belligerents of Europe to which we were and are utter strangers. Nothing in that cause, nothing in that quarrel, has or does involve a moral or equitable or material interest in or obligation of our Government or our people.

To this program every impulse of patriotism, every sense of right, every feeling of humanity, every sentiment of loyalty, every obligation of duty within me combine in forbidding my consent until the Government and its people, through its rightful and constitutional voice—the Congress of the United States—have clearly spoken, in the passage of such a resolution as is now before the House. Then and then only will it become the patriotic duty of each Member of the House and Senate to merge his individual judgment and conviction into those so declared of his country, as it will become the duty of every American in and out of Congress, to make the judgment and conviction of his country thus written into statute his judgment and conviction. [Applause.] The voice of law will command, and a patriotic duty will demand, loyal and earnest and active submission and obedience. Until then each should have and does have the inherent right, and it is his bounden duty to himself and to truth to vote his conviction.

I can conceive of a brave, loyal, devoted son of a father who contemplates a personal difficulty with another begging and persuading him to refrain, even condemning, and protesting in vain against his proposed step, but when the final word is spoken and blows are about to be given, taking off his coat and struggling with all of his soul and might in defense of that father.

When this Nation, as it doubtless will today, speaks the final word through the Congress, I trust I will be found in relation with my Government and my country emulating the example of that son. [Applause.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 3, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAYBURN.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, holy, holy is Thy name; heaven and earth are full of Thy glory. We pray Thee to extend our vision to cover the adventures of thought and action in seeking to perform our whole duty. We pray that nations may cease to reckon their wealth in possessions rather than in Christian ideals. Blessed Lord, as life today is a tremendous challenge to our faith, inspire us to catch a vision of Thy righteous purpose for all humanity, and then may we give ourselves unfalteringly to do Thy will. O save us from the guilty sin of indifference and stir our hearts with a passion for men. Almighty God, our help in ages past, as envy and hate are writing lines of blood and fire across the world, stay the mighty tides of fear which are being hurled against the promises of our holy faith. We pray that our country may ever stand with open arms of peace and brotherhood where cross the crowded paths of life. Through Christ our blessed Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE PONY EXPRESS

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, 80 years ago today, April 3, 1860, the pony express from St. Joseph, Mo., to Sacramento, Calif., was started in spectacular fashion. Measured in far-reaching results, the event was of more importance than Lindbergh's later lone flight over the Atlantic in a plane which bore the name of another Missouri city—the Spirit of St. Louis.

Missouri, daughter of Virginia and Kentucky and other of the older States to the east, and mother of practically all States to the west, has been the base for many movements, the scene of many starts. From the heart of Missouri, and in what is now a part of the Second Congressional District, which I have the privilege to represent, Kit Carson came. Here met the Old Trails Road and the Santa Fe Trail, the latter stretching away 700 miles to the southwest, "like a phantom finger pointing to a land of promise." In western Missouri the Mormon migration paused, then pressed on to establish its beautiful central city, Salt Lake City. Near what is now Kansas City was to be seen a signboard reading, "Oregon, 1,900 miles," and pointing the way to the far Northwest. It was in Missouri, too, that General Doniphan assembled his troops, described as "rough, ready, and ragged," and successfully led them into Mexico, completing an all-time long-distance march.

So it is not surprising that the pony express should have had its beginning in Missouri. On the trial run, over mountains, plains, and desert places, and in constant peril from Indians, men—they were mostly mere boys—mounted on horses selected for speed and stamina, covered the almost 2,000 miles in 1 hour less than 10 days, the time fixed. There was no radio beam to guide them through the night, no telephone, no telegraph, "no nothing." The one thought that these riders—as good as ever sat in a saddle—kept in mind was, "The mail must go through." It did. It does today.

The mail goes through due to the faithfulness and efficiency of thousands of men and women in post offices, on trains, on city and rural routes, and who, as parts of a great department, afford the public the finest postal service in all the world and at the lowest cost.

The life of the pony express, the agency through which the half million men "on the other side of the mighty mountains" were afforded limited touch with others, was not long. In its 16 months of service, though, it contributed to the retention in the Union of a rich commonwealth, hurried the building of a telegraph line to the Pacific coast, and stimulated interest in the construction of a railroad to the far West.

The pony express line comprised 190 stations, 400 stationmen, about 420 horses, and 80 regular riders, the number of horses and riders varying from time to time.

Although called the pony express, it was mail—letters at $5 for each half ounce, postage being later reduced—that the riders carried. There was also what was known as heavy mail, which went through in wagons drawn by Missouri mules.

The best record made by the pony express was in getting President Lincoln's first inaugural address across the continent in March 1861. From St. Joseph the run was made in 7 days and 16 hours, at an average speed of 10.6 miles per hour.

The pony express, which ceased to operate with the completion of a through telegraph line, sustained a loss of $200,000; but as the promoters lost, the public profited and continues to profit.

While it is not always possible to closely connect cause and effect, it is not too farfetched to think of the pony express as the first step in rural mail delivery, although it was 36 years later that the service, as we know it, was started.

On October 1, 1896, the first experimental Rural Delivery Service was established from Charles Town, Uvilla, and Halltown, W. Va. The first complete county rural mail service was established December 20, 1899, in Carroll County, Md. Today there are 32,839 rural mail routes, embracing 1,392,657 miles and affording service to approximately 7,708,000 families and 28,650,000 individuals.

In the time which has elapsed since the first rural route was established, forty-odd years ago, changes in length of routes, in roads, in weight and bulk of load, in equipment of carriers, in salaries paid, and, in fact, in practically everything, have taken place. In one notable respect, though, there has been no change since the pony express carried the first mail 80 years ago today. The slogan then was, "The mail must go through." That is the slogan still. It stands for service, service unexcelled.

Two of the earliest experimental mail routes were established at Cairo, Mo., October 15, 1896. Today there are 1,550 rural routes in operation in Missouri, 232 in the Second Congressional District.

Knowing that the weather since Christmas had been about the worst ever experienced in Missouri, and being deeply interested in the Rural Delivery Service, which means so much to farm families, I recently wrote each of the carriers in our congressional district. The many replies constitute the most interesting correspondence I have ever received from any source. I wish it were possible to make complete use of all these letters, to have you—yes, to have all connected with the Post Office Department in Washington, and especially in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, who has to do with rural mail service—read what these carriers have written.

The reading of letters from rural carriers results in renewed respect and admiration for Uncle Sam's peacetime army, whose line of march, covered each weekday, measures more than one and one-third million miles.

In all the correspondence there are few complaints. Instead, there are scores of expressions of appreciation. "I am truly thankful for my job and glad to have such fine folks on my route" is a characteristic comment. Scattering suggestions are: "Some more modern mail boxes," "fewer loose coins instead of stamps when weather is cold and fingers numb," "paths opened to mail boxes when snow is deep," and—this from practically all who comment in any way—"more all-weather roads."

Bad roads are the "Indians," and severe weather and deep snows the "outlaws," causing worry to the rural carrier of 1940. Let it be understood, though, that the typical rural carrier is no "softie." Instead, as I read what many have written, it seems that carriers, meeting the challenge and with dogged determination, enjoyed battling snow, walking long distances through byroads and fields, or shoveling out of deep drifts, just, in true Missouri fashion, to "show" Old Man Winter that, as in the days of the pony express, "the mail must go through."

Because of snow and the almost bottomless mud which came with spring, thaws on roads not yet improved, or where there were unpaved parts on roads otherwise hard-surfaced, in many cases carriers hired one or more men as helpers. So over most of the mileage, even when conditions were worst, regular mail deliveries were made. How? Here follow some answers:

Farmers, in one case as many as 20, came with scoops and shovels and opened the road through a long snow-filled cut.

Patrons met me and carried mail to neighbors.

Got my car pulled out three times on one trip, and the owners of teams did not charge a cent.

In making my route one day I had, at different times, four teams, a truck, and two tractors hitched onto the old car.

In my 32 years of service the past 3 months have surpassed anything I have experienced. I have personally paid out over $200 for help, but my patrons repay in their appreciation of the best service I can possibly give.

Part of the time when roads were worst I either walked or rode a horse loaned me by patrons. Often they would meet me at the mail box with hot coffee, soup, or sandwiches, which tasted mighty good during those subzero days.

From February 16 to March 16 I hired two helpers every day, still driving 70 to 75 miles each day, and my helpers walking 6 to 8 miles. In the 2 months from January to March I drove approximately 1,000 miles extra.

One carrier, where the soil is deep, and with 14 miles of dirt roads remaining on his route, writes:

On bad roads I used a model A Ford with high fenders and clearance and equipped with a special dual gear for more power. With this car I was able to make every foot of my route every day in the entire year 1939. However, I was not able to maintain this record during the present winter because of snowdrifts from 3 to 5 feet deep, and later, because of deep-rolling mud, impassable even for low-wheeled wagons. At different times I employed three farmers on horseback to deliver part of my mail. On several days my expenses were more than double my pay for the day. Twice I pulled the back end (differential) out of my Ford; one day I had three "flats," within a distance of less than 3 miles, on rough, frozen roads, resulting in two ruined tires; and on this same day my battery hit a frozen chunk and dropped from my car to the ground, where it was broken. I still have acid burns on my fingers to show for this experience.

Referring to changes in his 32 years on the same route, one carrier comments:

When I started carrying the mail a horse could easily carry a man and what mail I had. However, the mail has increased in volume to the extent that a pick-up truck is as much overloaded as a horse was at any time in the early days.

Then I would have you note the philosophy of one who writes as follows:

After all, Mr. NELSON, there is a great deal more to being a rural carrier than just drawing your pay check twice a month. I hardly think there is any individual who has closer contact with the rural population of this country. I feel that every rural carrier has two strong incentives which make him expend every effort to see that the mail goes through. One is his pride in the service and the other the interest he has in his patrons. I have been on the route for nearly 21 years. I have seen the newly married couple settle down on their little farm. Soon a little youngster is toddling down to the mail box to get the mail. I have seen them grow to men and women, have carried their letters to the folks at home when they were away at school. During past years of drought and depression I have seen them lose their farms they had worked so hard to save. At last I have seen them carried to their final resting places. That, Mr. NELSON, is the life of a rural carrier, whose daily contacts with humanity so few have the privilege to experience.

Many unusual happenings are recounted, a few being as follows:

Twenty years ago, when there were still many unbridged streams, I was caught, during a severe storm, between two creeks and spent the night, having two hounds as company, in a hay mow in a large barn, the farm family having smallpox.

At one time when the creek was running over the road my horse went through a culvert. We both went under the water, but floundered out and completed the route. There is a sort of unwritten law among rural carriers that the mail must go through regardless of obstacles such as snow, mud, or high water.

I recall one winter when rabbits were high in price on the city markets and it seemed that every fellow and his boy started to hunt and ship to market by parcel post. It was in the old days and I was using a team and buggy. For the last 3 or 4 miles the load was so heavy that I had to walk and let the rabbits ride. The boys at the office got to calling my rig the "rabbit special."

I have had some unusual experiences. In making delivery one winter day to the home where a feeble old lady lived with her son, who was digging coal at the time, I could hear groans from within the house. Not being able to get a response to my knocking, I took courage and opened the door. To my astonishment I found that the aged lady had fallen on the floor and was unable to get to her bed. I helped her to her day bed, built up the fire, and left her mail. Then I hurried down the road to the next neighbor, who called the doctor and her children by phone.

This morning a lady left her alarm clock in the mail box. With it was a note saying that she had forgotten to wind it and it had stopped. She wanted me to set it so she would know what time it was. I did.

Many and impressive are the words of appreciation as voiced by carriers. Thanks are expressed for "a good job," "for the finest patrons anybody could hope to have," "for the great amount of money"—and in common with them I wish that more emergency money might be so spent—"that has been provided for better rural roads," "for the privilege of watching the changing seasons, noting the coming and going of birds, the planting and harvesting of crops, and knowing real folks."

One woman carrier, then on a different route, tells of the time when she paid out over $100 per month for help, besides driving as much as 100 miles a day in order to serve all the boxes. Concluding, she says:

My present roads have received many miles of gravel, and while I still have some very bad dirt roads, my work is much easier than when I started twenty-odd years ago.

Proof that a willing carrier has good patrons is shown by the following letter:

At the beginning of a "national clean-up week" on old mail boxes I found I had 43 patrons with old type, open-top boxes. I asked each in a friendly way to erect new ones, and all 43 did so willingly. I feel that this is a fine record for mail-box improvement. It shows what good cooperation I have from my patrons and postmaster.

Genuine gratefulness finds expression in the following:

We had a tough winter, but please believe me when I tell you there has been no complaint on my part and will be none. I am so glad to have the work.

The past winter was one of the worst I have experienced in 28 years, but it is all over now. The sun is shining again, and we live in the good old U. S. A. So why worry?

It has been my good fortune to have the very finest and most appreciative patrons, which, of course, has made it easier to smile when the going is tough.

I digress here to say that consolidation of rural routes should, with but few exceptions, be delayed. Not many roads are ready. Furthermore, now is a poor time to add to unemployment. I have opposed transfers of carriers to fill vacancies at other offices, feeling that open competitive examinations should be held, preliminary to the appointment of some local man or woman.

Close cooperation between postmasters and carriers seems to be the rule, as many who write speak of this. One carrier says:

After fighting snow drifts all day, we returned at 9 o'clock in the evening to find the postmaster waiting for us with a warm fire, when it was 17 below zero outside.

Another writes:

We have wonderful cooperation through our post office.

Still another adds:

Our postmaster is pure gold.

While a third comments:

Our postmaster is "tops."

My long experience with the Post Office Department here in Washington, where up-to-the-minute efficiency and unfailing courtesy on the part of every individual, from the Postmaster General to the lowest paid employee, is the rule, convinces me, as, in addition, I read the letters from carriers, and as I recall the best-of-all postmasters in my own district, that no department of the Government excels that which sees to it that the mail goes through, goes through even as it did on the pony express, which started 80 years ago today from St. Joseph, Mo.

Conditions, citizens, countries change. Nowhere have changes come more swiftly, speed characterizing the movement of Americans, than here, and especially in that broad expanse west of the Mississippi. The "prairie schooner of the grassy seas" is at rest "in the dim haven of lost ships." Travel is by automobile and air-conditioned trains. In the memory of men now living, herds of buffalo—more even than are shown in modern movies—slowed the wagon trains of the pioneer and interfered with the progress of the pony express. Today, in some of the same States, cattle—"Whitefaces," and "Reds, Whites and Roans"—graze contentedly, taking no note of airplanes as they swiftly carry the mail across a continent.

Changes, many! But the spirit that spurred the youthful riders of the pony express is unchanged. Uncle Sam's Postal Service—speedy, sure, safe—proves that the words, "The mail must go through," represented more than a slogan. The mail does go through. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include an article by George Rothwell Brown in the New York American, entitled "The Spending Program Is Resumed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a short editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXPENSE ACCOUNTS OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] in a lengthy speech made certain allegations concerning the operations of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. He charged that the members of this Board and its principal executives were wasting vast sums of money in travel for their personal pleasure and advantage and to attend to their personal affairs. The gentleman from Illinois did not at the time specifically give the House information relative to all the trips that the principal executives are alleged to have made, covering the ground in a general way, but inserted them in the RECORD. For instance, at the time those of us who listened to his remarks did not know that the travel vouchers to which he referred extended over the period from 1933 to 1939, inclusive.

I have known for some time that because of the antagonism of a few employees who are no longer connected with the organization and who have had it in for their former superiors because they are now out a statement of this kind was being prepared. References to this proposed statement were published in the newspapers all over the country weeks ago. I have made it my business to know something about the work of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and its expenses, and there are some things about the statements of the Member from Illinois which ought to be brought to the attention of this House and the country at this time.

I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not in possession of information at this time that would warrant me in assailing the contentions of the gentleman from Illinois that these executives did travel at Government expense in connection with trips for their personal pleasure.

It so happened there was a meeting of the Committee on Expenditures, of which I am chairman, this morning, and the speech of the gentleman from Illinois was discussed. I explained to the committee that the Comptroller General's office went to work on these travel lists of names, picked out and supplied to them, last August and they worked on them until the 8th of February, when they submitted the material to Hon. Jesse Jones, the Federal Loan Administrator. Mr. Jones examined this statement and immediately asked for a complete report. Had the gentleman from Illinois called the office of Mr. Jones, the Federal Loan Administrator, he would have been so advised.

As I said before, the travel vouchers for Board members of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and some of their principal executives go back to 1933.

The material submitted by the Comptroller General's office, I am informed, covers about 85 typewritten pages. Anyone must admit that it would be impossible to examine the records and check all this material in a few days, when it took the General Accounting Office 5 months to put it together. It seems to me it is only fair to Members of this House and the public to know what these gentlemen whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] attacked have to say before passing judgment. I know I will await their explanation before agreeing to an investigation, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] demands.

For example, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] said that last year the Home Owners' Loan Corporation spent $1,478,562 for travel, and he sought in his address to convey to this House the idea that a considerable amount of this travel money was spent by Board members and managers of the Corporation. The facts are that this travel cost is almost entirely for a large number of field men at work in every State in the country whose duty it is to call regularly on borrowers who fall behind on their accounts, in order to assist them in every possible way to save their homes and prevent foreclosure, men who look after properties owned, delinquent taxes, insurance, repairs, and so forth.

Right now these men are engaged on over 200,000 cases of families which are asking for extensions of their loans under the terms of the Mead-Barry amendment which we passed last year. The work of these men has to be supervised and approved by higher officials and the Board, but as the work of the Corporation has contracted and reorganization and consolidation of offices has gone ahead, the travel of Board members and executives has declined steadily.

For last year the total travel expenses of Board members on Home Owners' Loan Corporation business was less than a thousand dollars out of the $1,400,000 quoted by the gentleman from Illinois. In 1938 it was but $1,918.28 out of a total necessary travel expenditure in the field of $1,565,786.08. For the 6½ years from its organization in 1933 to the end of 1939, the total amount spent for travel by the members of the Board of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was but the insignificant sum of $19,019.53. These facts were not brought out in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois.

This Board and its executives are managing the largest home-mortgage company ever set up anywhere in the world. It has handled nearly 2,000,000 applications for loans amounting to over $6,000,000,000. It has managed hundreds of offices and had nearly 22,000 employees. This number has now been reduced more than half. It made over a million loans and disbursed over $3,000,000,000. In every year since it has been operating under congressional appropriations it has carried on its work well below these appropriations.

Surely no one would suggest that any such vast enterprise as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation could be run properly if the members of its Board, as well as its executives, did not keep posted personally as to how the work was being done in every part of the country. Naturally, Board members and managers were assigned to overlook and when necessary travel to those sections of the country about which they knew the most, although all of them responsible for management had to be familiar with the problems which came up in the States and areas where the greatest mortgage troubles had developed.

As the chief executive of the Corporation under the law, the Chairman of the Board was called upon to travel more than any other member of the Board and to devote more of his personal attention to the northeastern part of the country, where the greatest mortgage trouble existed. The New York and Boston regions of the Corporation had to deal with more than double the volume of business of any other regions in the country. The mortgage smash-up in New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the other New England States was the worst which has ever occurred anywhere in the world, and that section has not yet recovered from it.

Of course, the Board and its managers should have, as they did, put into that situation every bit of effort they could and every hour they could spare away from Washington.

The gentleman from Illinois talked about these men going out over week ends where the troubles were thickest and insinuates they went for pleasure. The truth is the record shows they rarely could get away from Washington for work out in the field, except at week ends, because of continuous Board meetings for which managers had to be at hand as well as the Board members. This Board serves three separate corporations, and during the years the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] talks about they held over 4,000 Board meetings.

I am informed it has seldom been practicable for Board members to be absent from these meetings during the middle of the week. In part these Board members and the executives of the Corporation feel they are being criticized because they gave up their Sundays and holidays in order to speed up the work and without regard for themselves or their families. Anyone who knows about the work of this Home Owners' Loan Corporation knows that this kind of work has been true not only of the managers but of the employees all the way down the line. They have given thousands of hours to the service of these home owners who were in trouble on nights and Sundays outside of their regular hours without a cent of additional pay. I am told that only within the last few months in handling the applications for the changing over of accounts under the new provisions of the law, a total of over 200,000 hours of overtime has been worked by the rank and file, in addition to the time that has also been given by those who oversee their work.

In many Government departments and independent agencies like the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Housing Administration, the Works Progress Administration, the United States Housing Authority, to mention only a few, the people in the ranks, and those in the management have worked without thought of themselves and continue to do so in fighting the effects of the collapse caused by the 1929 panic.

I am not well enough informed to answer in detail what the gentleman from Illinois has charged concerning the travel of all the members of the Board and various individuals whose names he called in his talk yesterday. These men are perfectly able to speak for themselves; they have a right to be heard; and when the report which the Federal Loan Administrator will return to the Comptroller General is available, all the facts should be known to the Members of this House. I will see to it that this report is submitted to the Committee on Expenditures and carefully examined.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] again referred to the travel vouchers of Nugent Fallon, deputy general manager. Last June the gentleman from Illinois spoke on this very subject. I secured an explanation from the Chairman of the Board, Mr. Fahey, and, in my opinion, Mr. Fallon covered every trip he had made in detail, naming those he contacted and the nature of his business. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] stated the reply of Mr. Fallon was flimsy. Anyone who reads the explanation will, I feel, agree it was in no way flimsy. Mr. Fallon not only spoke of his official business but even referred to his personal affairs in order to justify his trips.

As I said yesterday, I do not condone, nor never will, the illegal expenditures of public funds, nor would I in any way attempt to protect one who is guilty of using public funds for pleasure trips or for any purpose other than official business.

In conclusion, let me say the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] made the statement on the floor that the Comptroller General had tried to examine the Home Owners' Loan Corporation's accounts and its officials opposed it. That is not the fact. The fact is that from the very beginning of the Corporation's operations in 1933 and 1934 the General Accounting Office was invited to help set up the Corporation's accounts and books, and cooperated in setting up these accounts. Never on any occasion has the Board or any of its officials denied them access to its records. Not only that, but when they sent their representatives on the travel matter every convenience and facility was placed at their disposal.

I might also add that the Comptroller General did not send to the Attorney General a copy of the report that it sent to Mr. Jones until it was asked to do so. One who listened to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] yesterday would have come to the conclusion that the Comptroller General had voluntarily submitted such a report to the Department of Justice. I take it that the matter was probably called to the attention of the Attorney General and that is the reason he asked for a copy of the report.

When the answer of the officials who were attacked by the gentleman from Illinois yesterday is available, with the permission of the House I will place it in the RECORD. [Applause.]

THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask Mr. Morgenthau where he is going to get the money, because in looking over the Treasury statement of June 30, 1939, I find that the gross public debt of the United States amounted to $40,439,500,000, an increase of $3,274,800,000 over the figures of June 30, 1938. On March 30, 1940, the gross public debt amounted to $42,540,000,000, an increase over the figures of June 30, 1939, of $2,100,500,000. During the same 9-month period the Federal expenditure exceeded income by $2,718,391,000, and gives a difference in those figures of $617,891,000.

I cannot understand how Mr. Morgenthau gets those figures, nor can I understand how he can juggle his statement so that we deduct $617,000,000. There is something wrong in Denmark some place. We want and must have enlightening Government statements, true accounts of our financial standing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"TEMPORARY NATIONAL ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

"To complete carrying out the purposes of the joint resolution creating the Temporary National Economic Committee, approved June 16, 1938, to be available only for allocation to the departments and agencies represented on the Committee for the necessary expenses thereof, including the objects specified under this head in the Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1938, $60,000, fiscal year 1940, to remain available until the expiration of the Seventy-sixth Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,500,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert: "$850,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$41,387"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$306,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

On No. 1: Appropriates $2,500, as proposed by the Senate, for a portrait of former President Hoover to be placed in the White House.

On No. 2: Appropriates $60,000, instead of $90,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the Temporary National Economic Committee in the language, proposed by the Senate, modified to specify that the appropriation shall be in "completion" of the work of the committee.

On No. 3: Appropriates $2,500,000, instead of $2,000,000, as proposed by the House and $3,000,000 as proposed by the Senate, for control of incipient and emergency outbreaks of insect pests.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition on the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, there is very little controversy in the conference report. I might say in passing—I hope it is of interest—if the conference report is adopted, the bill will be $3,670,317 less than the Budget estimates. I do not know of anything in the bill about which there is any controversy, and I am not going to consume any time at the moment on the conference report.

I believe this is the first occasion in 17 or 18 years' service in the House of Representatives when I have commented on a newspaper article in a current paper. Mr. Speaker, I do not make it a habit of taking the floor every time something appears in a paper that I do not like or that does not express my views. But an article appeared in the Washington Post this morning which I believe should be commented upon. The article in question was written by a very estimable young gentleman who writes for the Washington Post, John B. Oakes, whom I admire very much. I regret very much personally to have to take the floor of the House to correct one of his articles. It is headed, "Probers tell subcommittee high W. P. A. official is 'venal.'" And the venal is in quotations. Continuing, it reads:

A confidential report described as showing a high Washington official of W. P. A. to be "personally venal"— was presented yesterday to the House appropriations subcommittee handling relief.

And the words "personally venal" are quoted—

The report and related documents, summarizing an extensive investigation of the W. P. A. carried on since the last regular session of Congress, was also said by the Post's informant to disclose some cases of "inefficiency and dishonesty" on W. P. A. projects in the States.

Then the article goes ahead to give an account of an executive session of the Deficiency Subcommitee on Appropriations, and so forth. The remainder of the article is substantially accurate.

Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no foundation under the blue vault of heaven for such an article as that. I know no member of the committee gave Mr. Oakes such information. I have not asked the young gentleman—because we understand that reporters do not disclose where they secure their information—but I am perfectly confident that no member of the subcommittee gave him any such information as that. The word "venal" did not appear in the whole conference that we had, nor was there anything suggesting any question upon the personal character or integrity of any high W. P. A. official in Washington. We have summoned before our committee tomorrow Colonel Harrington, Director of the W. P. A., to give information relative to the 1941 relief estimate. This blanket charge is a manifestly unfair procedure. It is very unfair to any Government official to have to appear before a congressional committee with such a charge as that hanging over him, and that charge hangs over every W. P. A. official.

I believe the RECORD will bear out the statement that I have not hesitated to criticize W. P. A. and the officials of the W. P. A. in the past, and I shall do so in the future I am confident.

The specific question was asked in our conference yesterday—and inasmuch as this press statement is very unfair to the person I will state this much—as to whether or not the personal integrity or character of the high W. P. A. officials was involved and the answer was in the negative.

We met in executive session and went over rather hastily the reports of our investigators. We had a report from our attorney in connection with investigations in a great many States covering a great many transactions, some of which in due course of events will undoubtedly be criticized upon the floor of the House. But I want to say, and I think it is only fair to say this, and I would like to be corrected if I overstate it, that nothing was stated in that conference which in any way reflected in the slightest degree on the character or integrity of Colonel Harrington of the W. P. A. I have disagreed with Colonel Harrington in his official acts in the past and I am confident I shall do so in the future with reference to some things that I understand are coming on for consideration by the committee of the House, but I think it is very unfair when articles of this kind appear, and I hope this young gentleman in the future will be more careful where he gets his information, especially when there is carried with it the import that this article carries. The W. P. A. committee has a mass of evidence, some of which will come in for criticism by the committee and by the House. There has been no whitewashing, there has been no suppression, and there will be none, but the committee is going to proceed in an orderly way. It is interested in trying to improve this relief program; it is interested in seeing to it that the funds which the Congress appropriates for destitute people will go to those people and it will do whatever it can to bring that about.

It is not interested, I believe—and certainly, speaking for myself, I am not interested—in any public performance or in any scandal or in any unnecessary airing of things of that sort. Everything the committee has received will be open for the consideration and the use of the members of the committee, as well as Members of the House, in due time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and other gentlemen who are on the floor now were present at that committee meeting. If I have overstated the situation, or if I have understated it, I stand ready to be corrected, but I feel confident every member of the committee will concur in what I have said.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I listened to the report of the conferees, I gathered that the sum for insect control was increased $500,000 by the conferees.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman from Montana has been most diligent in working for this appropriation. The Budget estimate for insect control was $3,000,000. The House appropriated $2,000,000. The Senate put it back to $3,000,000, and the conferees split the difference and made it $2,500,000. There is an unexpended balance of $400,000, which gives that Department $2,900,000 for their insect-control campaign during this year, and I think that will be ample.

Mr. O'CONNOR. May I say to the gentleman that we are very grateful for the additional amount allowed by the conferees. I still maintain, however, that we should have the original amount recommended by the Budget, namely $3,000,000.

These grasshoppers and insects do not give much notice when they are coming to destroy and eat up a field of grain. About the first warning we get is when we see the heavens clouded with them. The next move is they swoop down and eat everything in their path in the way of vegetation. Therefore we must have the means at hand to control them. The control program has been very effective under the Bureau of Entomology. I wish to say further that we can trust this Bureau with the money. It will not be used unless needed. The best evidence in support of this statement is the fact that it now has an unexpired balance of $400,000. I want to say again, however, that personally I appreciate very much what the gentleman has done toward increasing the amount heretofore allowed by the House.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. May I ask if the conferees did their duty on the question of the Dutch elm disease?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I do not think that is in this bill.

Mr. EATON. The insects are in it.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. May I inquire with reference to an item which I think is in this bill, concerning an appropriation for soil-conservation payments to farmers? Is there such an item?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. There is such an item in this bill.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. What is the amount?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It is $60,000,000, and that amount has been taken out of the regular agricultural bill.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I have had a great many letters from cotton farmers in my district who have received letters from the Department stating that those payments cannot be made until this appropriation goes through.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time; and I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the first we heard from the Senate of the United States this year was a great hullabaloo spread all over the newspapers concerning the adoption of Senate Resolution No. 33, known as the Harrison resolution, providing for a joint committee of 12, 6 from the House and 6 from the Senate, to study the fiscal situation of the Government, its expenditures, its Budget, its appropriations, its revenues, and the needs of the various departments, with the idea of saving money. Almost every bill, however, that has been sent to the Senate has come back with increases of large amounts. Would to God that that body could practice what it preaches. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. POWERS. Has the Senate sent any appropriation bill back this year which carried a reduction under the House figure?

Mr. TABER. I think the first appropriation bill sent over there came back with a reduction, to which the House very readily and very quickly agreed.

Mr. POWERS. That was such an unusual thing I imagine the House could very readily agree.

Mr. TABER. But the Senate very quickly forgot its good resolution and began to amend these appropriation bills upward. I wish that the Senate could have some regard for the taxpayers and the credit of the United States.

In this particular bill it considered increased Budget estimates of $1,554,000 and the bill finally as it came from the conference is increased above the House bill by nearly $2,000,000. This means that the House receded on $1,966,000 and the Senate receded on only $741,000. Frankly, I was disappointed that we receded on so much, because we receded on nearly three times as much as the Senate did in that conference.

I shall not ask for a division or a roll call on the conference report. This is a minor report insofar as dollars go. However, there are now pending in conference between the Houses bills in which the Senate has increased the appropriations made by the House by upwards of $300,000,000. I am hopeful that in these future conferences the position of the House can more nearly be adhered to and that the Senate will pay some attention to Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 33, the first piece of business the Senate really did in this session, and that they will be prepared to yield to the House conferees in very large measure on the increases the Senate has added to these bills. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 9: On page 18, after line 5, insert the following:

"FIRST INTER-AMERICAN CONGRESS ON INDIAN LIFE

"For the expenses of participation by the United States in the first Inter-American Congress on Indian Life, to be held at Patzcuaro, Mexico, in 1940, including personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere; stenographic reporting, translating, and other services by contract if deemed necessary; rent; travel expense; local transportation; transportation of things; purchase of necessary books, documents, newspapers, and periodicals; stationery; equipment; official cards; printing and binding; official entertainment; costs of assembling, installing, packing, transporting, safekeeping, demonstration, and renovating a suitable exhibit, and the purchase of supplies incident thereto; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments may have been made for any of the purposes herein specified, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, fiscal year 1940, to remain available until June 30, 1941 (convention on the Pan American Union, adopted at Havana, Cuba, February 1928, ratified by the President March 6, 1931; resolution XCIII, adopted at Montevideo, December 24, 1933; resolution XIII, adopted at Lima, Peru, December 31, 1938), $8,000."

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

"In lieu of the sum named in such amendment insert '$2,000.'"

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address I delivered yesterday evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9209) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS], the ranking Member on the other side, if he has any suggestion with regard to a limitation on general debate?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, already 17 of my colleagues on this side of the House have requested time. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that general debate run through the day, and tomorrow if necessary.

Mr. SNYDER. Suppose we let general debate run through today, and tomorrow at noon the gentleman and I can get together and see if we can fix a time for closing general debate later that afternoon. Will that be satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. POWERS. With general debate running through the entire day today and no agreement as to when the bill will be read tomorrow, and then if I have further requests for time or the gentleman from Pennsylvania has further requests for time, we will agree that general debate will run on until all gentlemen have been accommodated; is that the gentleman's thought?

Mr. SNYDER. That will be satisfactory. I think tomorrow will take care of itself.

Mr. POWERS. Then it will be satisfactory to me to let general debate run for the balance of the day.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate run throughout the day, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] and myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 9209, the Military Establishment appropriation bill, 1941, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, the House added to the labor-Federal security bill the other day $67,591,000. I assure you it is purely a coincidence that this bill wipes out all of that increase save $233,340.

The closeness of the two amounts looks very suspicious, but the fact is we had reached our decisions well before the other bill was amended.

Now, in a serious vein, I want to say that we approached our task with this bill with an entirely open mind; with absolutely no notion of cutting to any predetermined extent. A defense measure, especially, should not be considered in any other way.

Of course, like all of the other subcommittees, we started out hunting for nonessentials; for projects of an unusual character, and projects for which former allocations had been well advanced, any of which did not seem to be justifiable upon the ground of immediate necessity or necessity at all, because, while all of us on the subcommittee are sympathetic toward defense needs, we also are in complete sympathy with the policy of retrenchment to the utmost extent practicable consistent with the public interests as we individually interpret them.

Before going further, I should like to say that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] sat with us this year for the first time. A former soldier, he was not a stranger to our problems, and we have been delighted with his counsel and help.

As our report shows, we have cut the Budget estimates for this bill $67,357,660. Besides that, we have reduced the amount sought by way of contractual authority by $42,840,500. In new availability, therefore, we have effected a reduction of $110,198,160.

While I feel confident our proposals, if sustained, will do no harm, I am afraid harm would ensue if we should cut any deeper, except, of course, a small amount here and there.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman speaks about reductions. Is any account taken of the money appropriated for relief purposes that has been allocated to the Army in the last two sessions of Congress?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does it appear in the hearings?

Mr. SNYDER. A table appears on page 49 of our hearings.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. A very large amount of the money that was appropriated for relief purposes was allocated to the Army.

Mr. SNYDER. I should not say a large amount for the current fiscal year; it is a considerable amount. May I say in that connection that I do not believe there is any agency in the United States that handles relief funds, such as W. P. A. funds, that gets more for the dollar out of the money allocated than does the Army.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I may state for the gentleman's information that I had occasion to go to the Munitions Building and saw down there the organization set up by the Army to prepare applications and get dockets and get them over to the Relief Administration to get Army allocations, and there were plenty of them.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I be not further interrupted until I have finished my statement.

The Budget estimate calls for $853,356,754. Included in that amount, however, is $153,466,988 for the satisfaction of maturing contracts heretofore authorized. That amount is out of reach. It represents commitments already made.

Therefore the amount left for us to consider was, roundly, $700,000,000.

Of course, that is a lot of money. The 1938 bill, which was the last one not affected by disturbed world conditions, carried $415,263,154. Now, why should there be that difference? Let me state a few facts.

The bill we present calls for $785,999,094. If we eliminate the amount therein on account of prior year contractual authority, there is left $632,532,106. That is an excess of $217,258,952 over the 1938 bill. Now, as to that excess, it will be recalled that during the present fiscal year the enlisted strength of the Army has been increased from 165,000 to 220,969, and the strength of the National Guard has increased from 205,000 officers and men to around 253,000 officers and men. The pay, subsistence, transportation, clothing, housing, and extra training for the National Guard of those expanded forces will account for well over half of that $217,258,952 difference. The remainder may be laid at the door of mechanization and motorization and more and improved munitions of sundry types; in other words, toward completely and modernly equipping the peacetime establishment as now constituted.

It seems to me, therefore, that it should be clear that unless the man strength is to be cut down, and unless we are not going to provide for the implementation of that man strength—not for any paper strength or strength that we do not actually have, then any further retrenchment than we are proposing would have to be at the expense of normal operating requirements on the 1938 basis, and I am sure no one here would advocate that.

The reduction, and, in fact, all money changes we are proposing, are set out in rather complete detail in the table commencing on page 4 of our report.

The principal contributing factors are these, and I shall use round figures:

Procurement planning and industrial mobilization	$11,500,000
New airplanes	23,300,000
Military-post construction	6,870,000
National Guard	8,300,000
Defer funds on account of 1940 contractual authority, military-post construction	5,000,000

With respect to procurement planning and industrial mobilization, I cannot get very enthusiastic over a good deal of the program at this particular time. In my judgment, the first need is to place guns in the hands of the men you have, and when you have done that, then do something about providing the means to produce more guns more quickly in the event of need. That is the theory which actuated us on the educational order part of the program.

The amount in this bill, as it came to us from the Budget, would leave a shortage of essential equipment costing $37,000,000, needed right now to equip the present forces, Regular Army and National Guard. Instead of allowing $16,250,000 for educating plants to produce material of the type embraced by such shortage, we are proposing to devote $2,000,000 to education, and the balance toward making up the shortage.

Of course, from the money angle, we make nothing on that arrangement. We take off of one place and add to another. Genuine defense preparation, however, profits to a very considerable extent.

Other phases of the program consist of production studies, rehabilitation and rounding out of our arsenals, special machinery—gages, dies, and so forth, and the usual run of so-called procurement planning activities, upon which we have been engaged since the World War.

These all call for $20,983,910, and we have allowed $9,414,746 of that amount, of which $6,131,681 is for arsenal rehabilitation, $2,494,500 for special machinery, and the remainder of $787,295 for procurement planning.

We have elaborated upon this matter at some length in our report.

The need for procurement planning and other means for making industry ready for possible large munition orders has been quite appreciably lessened as a result of our greatly expanded buying program, lately reinforced by foreign orders of no mean proportions. There is no doubt about the value of this kind of education—the kind that comes from actually producing articles. We feel that the amount that we have provided is adequate unless it be that we are looking beyond purely defense preparation.

With respect to airplanes, we met with an estimate of $55,438,588 for the procurement of 496 airplanes, all said to be required to replace losses expected to occur because of obsolescence or irreparable damage during the fiscal year 1942; replacement planes, in other words, because provision already has been made for the acquisition of the entire program of 5,500 serviceable airplanes.

It turns out that we are not going to get 2,200 of those 5,500 planes until foreign orders have been taken care of. The plan is to yield delivery priority to foreign governments over and above the number required for an operating force of our own of 3,300 planes. By so doing our production facilities are stepped up at the expense of foreign governments, and when we are ready for our delayed deliveries we shall get a later and improved product.

If we are willing to forego for the present the 2,200 planes, the committee felt that procurement of practically all of the 496 planes might be deferred also just as well. Therefore, we are providing for 57 planes—14 amphibians, 6 transports, and 37 advanced training. The amphibians, while replacements, are needed for use in the Puerto Rico area, and the Department wishes to get them under order as soon as possible.

The course we suggest will save $23,308,954 of cash and will permit of the elimination of the entire amount of $25,780,500 in the original estimate of contractual authority.

We had another problem in connection with airplanes. It develops that the Department underestimated by something like $30,000,000 the cost of the airplanes for which provision was made at the last regular session of Congress. Instead of waiting, however, for that additional amount to be made available in the regular way, contracts were entered into and the excess charged against funds provided for other purposes. That means that other funds, to the extent of $30,000,000, have been frozen, and some of them unquestionably must be freed.

The Budget includes $10,000,000 in cash partly to relieve the situation, and a supplemental estimate has been presented for the other $20,000,000 in the form of contractual authority.

This arrangement about letting foreign governments have delivery priority was only concluded a few days ago, and it would seem that, while the planes affected would be reserve planes, their nondelivery would lessen the need for release of all of the frozen amount. For that reason we are proposing to allow one-half of the supplemental estimate of $20,000,000 of contractual authority. If we have cut too much, they can go to the Senate Committee on Appropriations with their case.

Turning to military construction, the Budget estimate is $41,461,748. In that amount is $24,000,000 on account of prior-year contracts, leaving in cash for new undertakings $17,461,748, on account of which $12,000,000, in addition, is asked by way of contractual authority, or $29,461,748 altogether for new projects.

We have reduced that amount by $14,871,385, making available $10,590,363, in cash, and $4,000,000 in contractual authority.

We have deducted another $5,000,000 from the $24,000,000 requested on account of prior-year contracts. The Department finds that it will not need that $5,000,000 prior to July 1, 1941.

In that connection, I may say that we have taken off another $5,000,000 in somewhat the same way. The Ordnance people told us that they would not need until the fiscal year 1942 $5,000,000 of the amount in the Budget for 1941 procurements.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman given any thought to a special air unit for the National Guard?

Mr. SNYDER. I may say there are 8 squadrons to be established under the provisions of this bill, making 29 air squadrons for the National Guard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. Turning to the National Guard, the estimate for this component is in the staggering amount of $96,800,240. Possibly that should not be surprising, however, in view of the increase in the size of the guard from 205,000 to 253,000 officers and men.

With reference to this estimate and our action, I shall read from our report—page 22:

The original appropriation for the current fiscal year was $45,578,305. That amount subsequently was increased by $7,642,340 in the Supplementary Military Appropriations Act approved July 1, 1939, and later to the total of $71,402,977 by the Emergency Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1940, approved last February 12, in consequence of the President's order raising the strength of the National Guard from 210,000 officers and men to around 253,500 officers and men.

The further increase of $25,397,263 (net) now proposed occurs principally under the following heads:

Compensation of caretakers	$1,233,617
Camps of instruction	5,753,447
Armory drill pay	2,542,838
Arms, uniforms, equipment, etc	15,186,472

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Is it the gentleman's opinion that the Federal Government should eventually take over the maintenance costs of the National Guard, including not only the camps for which additional appropriations are made here beyond the Budget, but also armory construction?

Mr. SNYDER. No; it is not my thought that that should be done.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Would not that follow from the gentleman's statement that the guard has become, to a much greater extent, a Federal rather than a State force?

Mr. SNYDER. Not altogether; no. I do not think we ought to take away from the States any of their rights or powers with respect to the National Guard. The Federal Government merely should help where the necessity seems to justify such course, and here we have provided mostly for construction. Instead of having one rule to govern our course, I think we should leave it to the Congress from time to time to meet situations as they arise, as has been done in the past.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Are we not getting into a program which may have enormous implications in the future Federal expenditure program in extending the assistance of the Federal Government to the States in the guard camps which are not also Federal camps?

Mr. SNYDER. I may say to the gentleman that that is a problem with which undoubtedly we shall be called upon to deal.

The Budget provides for 60 armory drills and 27 days of field training. Compliance with the latter could not be general because a great many persons identified with the guard would find it almost impossible to spare that much time from their regular civilian pursuits.

The large increase in the fourth of the foregoing-listed projects, which is a net amount, is attributable principally to increase for ordnance equipment ($5,442,669) and motor equipment ($14,389,955).

These very naturally follow the guard's personnel expansion. It must be motorized and implemented as the principal component of the protective mobilization plan.

Attention should be drawn to the fact that the guard has outgrown the needs of the several States as a militia. It has become more and more a part of the Regular Army, and now exceeds the Regular Army numerically. The storage and care of the great amount of equipment, which its potential Federal employment makes necessary, has become a Federal matter, and it is reasonable to expect that the States will look to the Government to provide the necessary housing and maintenance personnel and supplies. In the accompanying bill the committee is providing an additional amount for caretakers and construction at National Guard camps, the latter very largely for the accommodation of the growing quantity of equipment. This has been done at the insistent demand of the National Guard Association and the Adjutants General Association.

The money changes effected by the committee in the National Guard budget are enumerated in the table on page 7 hereof. They have the endorsement of the National Guard Association. Difficulty has been experienced in conducting 60 drills, and to hold that number successfully would require an amendment of the law permitting certain of the extra drills to be taken concurrently with regular drills.

In lieu of 6 extra days of field training beyond the 6 extra days (21 in all) for which the Budget and accompanying bill make provision for summer-camp training, the committee has provided for 6 voluntary, without pay, week-end drills in the vicinity of home stations, with a ration allowance of 75 cents per diem and also an allowance for gasoline and oil. This is more or less an experiment. It is advocated, in principle, by the National Guard Association. The committee feels that it should be given a trial.

I should say that I have covered the principal items. We have continued the policy adopted as to all other bills of eliminating all increases for administrative promotions. They amount to $448,668. Also, we have endeavored to segregate all extra classified help employed during the expansion period and have denominated it as temporary.

There is a minor matter so far as the amount of money involved is concerned, to which I should possibly call attention. It has to do primarily with flying doctors or flight surgeons. We let the bars down last year and permitted the number to be increased to 86, but we limited the flying pay to $720 per annum. Other nonflying officers were limited to $1,440. These are officers identified with branches other than the Air Corps, who are required to fly from time to time to observe the operation of equipment, such as ordnance installations, Signal Corps installations, and Chemical Warfare installations. The doctors complain that the $720 rate is inadequate and also that we are discriminating. They are no doubt right on the discrimination score. Instead of raising the flying pay of the doctors, however, we have brought the other chaps down. This action affects the Navy, too, because the naval appropriation bill expressly subjects such class of flying personnel to the rates prescribed for the Army.

As to the Army men, I may say this: We are providing that they do not have to go up into the air and be flown around simply for the purpose of entitling them to flight pay. There is an Executive order based upon an old law which requires all persons drawing flying pay to fly a certain number of times and a certain number of hours within certain periods of time. It seems perfectly asinine to require a doctor to do this sort of thing. He may have to perform one or a dozen missions, but this business of burning gas and oil and taking the time of an officer aviator to fly him about to make up the difference between time in the air on legitimate missions and an arbitrarily fixed number of flying hours for flight-pay qualification just does not make sense to the committee.

Before concluding I wish to acknowledge the splendid support I have had from my colleagues on the subcommittee. They have all worked diligently and hard, and I am deeply indebted to each of them. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. I often take the floor, but recently only for a very few minutes at a time; and as I was asked to take some time today, I wish to enjoy myself in some comments of which you may perhaps approve. I hope to be sufficiently entertaining so that you will listen to me.

A colored preacher took for his text the Status Quo. "Brother Jones, what is the status quo?" "That is the Latin for 'the mess we is in.'" [Laughter.] So, if I may be privileged to do so, I think I might entitle my remarks "The Mess We Are In."

I intended to make these remarks chiefly for the consideration of the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]. I told him yesterday I was to speak today. I sent word to him some 20 minutes ago, and shall regret it exceedingly if he cannot be present. However, there are many Democrats here, I am sure, who will come to his rescue, and I shall gladly yield for any interruptions.

I often read the prolific remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]. I think very highly of him. I cannot imagine a more conscientious person. I cannot conceive of anyone giving more of himself to an effort for the benefit of mankind than he, and I often reread some of those original speeches of his. I have watched him, particularly of late, gradually mellowing, so to speak. I think he is suffering from what I often call "the weariness of futility." He delivered a speech the day before yesterday which, I am sure, was really affecting to all who listened to him. He closed that speech with these words:

America has never lost a battle yet. She is not going to lose this one now. There will arise, I firmly believe, a new consecration among us, a new devotion to duty and to our country and to every last person in it. The difference between right and wrong will become more clear, and here and there throughout the land will arise men of vision who will begin to say with conviction, "This way is the will of God for America."

Of course, that is a very affecting statement, and while we all want to follow the will of God for America, yet we must not strain ourselves too hard to try to offset His inexorable natural laws. I endorse the more recent religious philosophy of the times. However, I realize that it is the will of God that the big fish eat up the little fish, and the only way they can escape is to keep well in shallow water. I realize that big animals prey upon little animals. I realize that He brings the droughts, the floods, and the dust storms, and instead of trying to refute the will of God, I recommend to the gentleman from California that he do his very best to work in harmony with it. He probably does. We must suffer at times when it seems to be the will of God that we should suffer, and we must endure it as our forefathers have always done heretofore. The gentleman says that he is searching for fundamentals, and that that group of 70 Congressmen recently organized must be augmented in order to discover these fundamentals. If I can, I wish to help him find some fundamentals and shall make a few suggestions. Always and constantly he has advocated more money to increase the purchasing power of the people, and up to this very moment he seems to have been able to find no remedy except to borrow money and give it away, either in pensions, pump priming, or other largesses. That may be God's way up to a certain point. But philanthropy is not always "giving away." Philanthropy now, especially as it concerns our young people, who are being saddled with this huge debt, may be in taking back. We must find some way whereby we will not further tap the Treasury. The gentleman from California says, and he agrees with me, that business conditions are growing worse. I said the other day "that the index of business is going down like a rocket's useless stick." He argues that we must not do as we did in 1937 when it was going up. The administration then required increased "bank reserves" to prevent possible inflation.

He now says, "Do not do that, but let us spend more public money right now. Let us have $80,000,000 immediately for W. P. A., so that no one will be laid off before July 1." He says we have plenty of money; that we should take that silver bullion worth 34 cents an ounce, put a public stamp upon it, and call an ounce $1.29, and we will in that way have a billion and a half. We have the $3,000,000,000 worth of free gold, and let us spend that. Let us take what we have on hand in the Treasury and use it. This is his philosophy. Then he says we will not have to increase the public debt. He argues that we should take that which we have in assets—which we will need so badly and so soon—and spend it now, because, and he in effect throws up his hands and admits, "I see no other way." He states that we do not seem to arrive at any fundamental decision in the way of expansion of the currency. Expansion of the currency! As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] pointed out recently in a very able article "The quantitative theory of money" has been fully exploded and should never again be argued. Indeed, its efficacy has been completely disproved. Thus, according to the gentleman from California, we must keep on spending money, borrowed money, and if we have any on hand, use it for largesses. I might indulge in a bit of pleasantry. The husband said to his wife, "My check has come back from the bank." "Oh," she says, "good. What we can spend it for?" To make his arguments perfectly clear, we find ourselves in this position: That for the last 7 years we have done nothing—nothing to find any solution of a fundamental character for agriculture or anything else. That is a humiliating confession to make after 7 years of every possible experimentation and the expenditure of more than $25,000,000,000 of borrowed money, in addition to receipts, in haphazard and unfortunate experiments. It is indeed humiliating for a new dealer to have to make such a statement. Then the gentleman attempts comparisons of the present with the era of 1920–29.

He claims the situation now is nothing like what it was in that period. There are now so many inventions. We do not have to employ so many people. The machines do it.

We had inventions of machinery in the twenties, probably more than we have had recently. It has been clearly disproved that machines bring unemployment or curb employment, except for very brief periods. They frequently cause conditions that make for more employment. This argument is an insufficient answer.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care to yield at this time?

Mr. GIFFORD. Indeed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it is very interesting that in 1873, as I remember it, Congress employed an expert by the name of Dr. Carroll Wright to make a survey of what they called technological displacement at that time. If I remember correctly, the report was submitted, and he said, "All is dismal despair ahead of us. Machinery is displacing manpower. We are just about at the end of the rope." That was when Grant was President of the United States.

Mr. GIFFORD. That theory is exploded. Heaven help the day when inventive genius does not come to our rescue to find labor-saving devices and new things, such as the Du Ponts continually produce, which mean the employment of thousands of people in new industries.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have been waiting for the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The gentleman made the observation that there was probably some lag between men thrown out of a job and being taken in again. Some studies say it runs a considerable period. Of course, it is very hard to convince a man who loses his job because of a machine that machines are a good thing. That does not mean in the end that the machine is not good, but it is hard to convince a man who has lost his job on account of it. As Kipling said:

> The toad beneath the harrow knows
> Exactly where each tooth point goes;
> The butterfly from beside the road
> Preaches contentment to the toad.

Is it your idea to preach contentment to that poor fellow who is thrown out of a job because of a machine?

Mr. GIFFORD. I am not preaching. Happiness and contentment! Ignorance is bliss, but do not take an overdose of it, because you may die of too much rapture. Why plead ignorance of the real causes of unemployment and always take this defeatist attitude? I do not want to keep going further into debt, as the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] seems willing to do. There must certainly be a day of reckoning.

But the idea has an allure. An old man went into a clothing store and said, "My boy has owed you $20 for a suit of clothes for 3 years?" "Yes. Have you come in to pay for it?" "No," he says, "I want one on the same terms." [Laughter.]

That is what you want now. You want to keep going on in the same course; spend money borrowed from the people. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said on Monday, "We are borrowing money from the rich and giving it to the poor, for the rest of the American people to give back with compound interest." Why, the gentleman from California has discovered something, has he not? I was glad to hear of that discovery, but he argues later in his speech, "Let us borrow a lot more money and loan it to communities at 1 percent to build more and more and more public buildings and improvements." Only the wealthy communities will and can take it, just as they did before with all those P. W. A. funds. It is only the wealthy communities that can afford to borrow for such things. The poor cannot afford even the upkeep of them. The money has not been distributed where it should have been. Showered for vote-getting purposes, without doubt.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Is it not true today that many communities throughout the Nation can borrow money for 1 or 1½ percent over a long period of years for heavy construction? If they can, why do they not do it instead of depending upon the National Government?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, the gentleman knows our New England system of town meetings. He has watched them. All of our town meetings are refusing to spend money. They have generally lowered taxes. They at least have the spirit of economy. But the minute you put out a billion and a half more P. W. A. money, our wealthy communities will say, "We want our share. We are forced to contribute." And, blind as they are, those wealthy communities will take it, knowing they will pay back in the end many times the amount they received. For example, when they dedicate a schoolhouse in my district, it is always a Democratic rally. They announce, "We want you to thank President Roosevelt for this schoolhouse." They will pay back enough to build five schoolhouses. Cannot they recognize it? They probably do, but realize someone else would get it, and they might as well grab off their share. The people should be repeatedly reminded of what certain States are receiving from the Government every year, and of the amounts other States will have to repay, which will be many times greater than what they received. They should know where the burden, in the final analysis, will be placed.

I want to say to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] that there are some fundamentals that even new dealers should be able to recognize. A clipping from the Cleveland Plain Dealer came into my office this morning. I have a voluminous file relating to the Securities and Exchange Commission. When their appropriation bill was being considered here I took the floor for a few minutes. Why are we not all interested in the activities of this Commission? Capital and business are being strangled and made afraid by it. Certainly the Cleveland Plain Dealer is recognized as most favorable to the New Deal, yet I quote from it regarding that Commission:

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer of March 23, 1940]

We still feel the act is passably good, but its administration by the S. E. C. has been putrid. There is evidence in abundance to support the thesis that the Commission, in the exercise of its broad and largely undefined administrative powers, has gone much further than it was necessary to go to secure information for the public's protection. There is unfortunately not a little evidence pointing to a desire on the part of this agency to impede and to deter private financing to the end that the field for Government financing be extended and expanded, so that the alleged failure of private capital to seek productive employment could be used as excuse for unbalanced budgets, for pump-priming expenditures, for the encroachment of the Federal Government on private enterprise, as in the public-utility field, and as argument for the substitution, which already had gone too far, of a Government-managed economy for one of private enterprise.

Quickly drawn as it was and based on incomplete information with respect to the functioning of the stock exchanges and the business of security underwriting, the act was obviously imperfect. In some respects it was faulty in a high degree, but in the hands of a commission having "prudence, caution, and resolution" the act could have been made to provide the intended protection to investors without damming up completely the flow of new capital into productive enterprise.

That is from a newspaper which has been creating sentiment in favor of New Deal policies. It now seems to have become wiser. I wish the present occupant of the White House would say once in a while "I have made a mistake. I probably was wrong." All he would be saying to me would be "at last I have become wiser." He would not even have to apologize for it. But no, no mistakes have been acknowledged—failures go merrily on.

The first week of this year I prepared a resolution calling for an investigation of the Securities and Exchange Commission. I realized that a Republican had little chance of recognition, for we get none in such matters. I had fondly hoped that some such resolution would be introduced by a Democrat. Finally a Republican did offer that resolution of his own volition and also at my request. I would like to take my folder of complaints against the Securities and Exchange Commission which I have built up during the past few months and appear before the Rules Committee on behalf of that resolution. I think that there is very good reason for such an investigation. This bureaucratic monster is the greatest deterrent to business that can possibly be imagined. The gentleman from California would be doing something fundamental if he would demand that it be investigated.

I read in another paper:

The Securities and Exchange Commission men know full well what legislators can do to an agency through gruelling investigations like the National Labor Relations Board inquiry. As a result, the Securities and Exchange Commission will probably try to keep out of trouble and they will change things enough and say: "For the present, it is all right."

It is asserted that many investment trusts have been crooked. Some of them probably have been. Some Government officials have been crooked, too. In proportion to the men involved, would you dare to say to me that businessmen on the whole are more crooked than the politicians who run the various governments? Would you dare say to me that men appointed for political reasons could possibly know how to run business better than businessmen themselves? We do acknowledge that there has been crookedness; that there ought to be deterrents. But when you get enthusiastic reformers unwilling to proceed cautiously the results are often disastrous.

They should proceed with great caution so as not to disrupt everything and everybody. Such bureaucratic control has almost stopped the wheels of industry. The N. L. R. B. has awakened us to this fact, to the great distress of the new dealers. The gentleman from California further says, "It is just too bad that we will pile up a billion dollars more than we need this year for social security, taking it away from business." It is too bad, indeed. But is not his Townsend method even worse?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I wish it were possible for me to have more time. I was talking about "the mess we are in," and I was just beginning to get down to fundamentals for the benefit of the gentleman from California. However, I suggest to him that he study the disastrous effect on the Nation's business of the activities of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the N. L. R. B., excessive taxation, and the constant and unrelenting hounding of business by this administration. Is more funds for W. P. A. the only remedy to be provided in order to take care of unemployment? I regret that my time has been almost exhausted. Again, let us be mindful of the will of God. I repeat the plea that we try to work in harmony with it. Let us endeavor to adjust ourselves to the laws of supply and demand, recognize the inevitable, and stop extravagant expenditure of borrowed money in experiments already completely discredited.

Mr. Chairman, there is so much more to be said regarding which I have made notations. However, for the present it is for the Democrats to continue to try to solve these problems. In the fall the people themselves will have something to decide. I think I know what their decision will be. If the New Deal continues after 1940 I shall have but one explanation to give—"that man is the only known animal that can be skinned more than once." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time unless somebody on the other side would like to question me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 2 minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN A. HALL].

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the members of the committee for allotting me time in this debate to discuss the subject I am about to take up.

In 1935 and 1936, the Chenango and Susquehanna Rivers—whose headwaters rise in my district—overflowed, and there resulted the most serious floods in the Nation's history. Last week that identical thing was repeated. Those headwaters again surged downward through and over the valleys of the Susquehanna and the Chenango and on down through the State of Pennsylvania, wreaking death and destruction as they coursed their vicious and relentless way to the bay. This is an old story in my district. Many men, women, and children had suffered as the result of these precipitous floods. When the flood came this year they were, therefore, thoroughly imbued with the experiences of the past.

In 1935 and 1936, due to an intelligent press campaign in my locality, careful investigations were conducted, not only in my district, but all up and down the southern tier of counties in New York State, and in the up-State region as well. Attention was focused upon the need for a definite flood-control authority and for decisive steps to be taken to prevent any repetition of what happened in those years.

I take this opportunity to pay my respects and voice not only my gratitude but the gratitude of the vast majority of the people of my district to the congressional committee which, at that time, made a special trip to the flood areas of the State. As a result of that investigation and their observations there has since been conducted a positive and definite program for flood control. Over the past 4 or 5 years a great deal of good has been done. I need not point out that had there not been this flood-control work in my district the result of last week's floods would have been far more serious.

I am not advocating a large increase in any sense of the word of the present flood-control funds which will be allocated by the committee for next year's flood-control work. For the sake of my own locality I am, however, voicing what I believe is absolutely necessary, and that is a program such as that planned by the Army engineers to be carried out over the next few years in my district. The city of Binghamton, which is now bailing out after last week's flood, has not suffered any appreciable damage, but families have been evacuated from their homes, and there has been some trouble up that way. Another region I am going to describe is in and around Endicott, N. Y., which is comparatively near Binghamton, and at which point many houses were destroyed and persons driven from their homes by the swollen waters of the Susequehannna River.

It is the consensus of the people thereabout that funds could be properly expended by the Army engineers for dredging and for development of the river banks. I am not an engineer, and therefore I am not in a position to describe exactly what may be needed there, but from reading editorials and from statements of newspapermen and people living in Endicott, it occurs to me that there is a definite need for something more to be done there.

I have mentioned the constructive program that has been brought about in reference to flood control, and I want to pay tribute at this time to the splendid work accomplished by the Army engineers. Last fall it was my privilege to make an extended trip of observation throughout New York State with the Flood Control Commission. Many things were pointed out to me among which was the Whitney Point Dam, now being built in my locality, as well as developments in other regions of the State. I came home very enthusiastic after the observations of that trip, and I commend to the favorable consideration of the House the idea of extensive flood-control work in my locality. The people up there are really grateful; and after what has happened in the counties which I have the honor to represent, may I say that the work which has been carried on during the past 5 years has been of great value.

Mr. Chairman, lately I have several times discussed drought, and I have come to the conclusion that drought is disastrous in every sense of the word; but after observing what happened and the extent of the flood damage in my district, I will observe that if the water table at this particular time had been normal in my district, there would have been a serious flood. I suppose from that standpoint I should not be too critical of the results of the drought up my way. [Laughter.]

It is certain that if the program outlined by the Army engineers, to which I subscribed and for which I appeared before a subcommittee in February, is continued sooner or later in my locality, there will be an end to repetition of the floods from which we have suffered. There was some division of opinion earlier in the year as to what action should be taken in certain sections with reference to this flood-control work. Several people approached me stating it was their opinion it was really unnecessary to continue the work which is being pressed at the present time, because floods were usually predicated on the basis of occurring every 20 years, and since there was a flood in 1935 and 1936 there would not be another one for 20 years from that time. However, I believe that those people would be the first now to come to me and admit that there is a real need for flood-control work and they would state further that the very activities which they advocated being cut out and not included in the program should be included by all means.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say just one more word about the constructive program that has been going on in my region. When I was a member of the city council of Binghamton, it was my honor and privilege to represent the south side of that city, which has always been hardest hit at the time of any serious flood. The waters of the Susquehanna not only back up into the Chenango River, where those two rivers come together, but also flood the entire south side of the city of Binghamton. At present there is before the committee a suggestion to continue the work which has been started and to erect a substantial flood wall along the south side of the Susquehanna River. If this is done, the possibility of any future annoyance or damage will be absolutely eliminated and the south side of the city will be protected.

May I say an additional word about the village of Endicott and the town of Vestal, also located on the Susquehanna River. It has been the target for some of the most vicious floods which have surged down that river. The people of that neighborhood at this time are pretty well aroused and they are willing at any time to appear before a committee and ask that this work be continued. I do not wish to overemphasize the need in my locality for adequate protection and the intelligent use of funds in any program, because after all there are sections in Pennsylvania which are also affected, and in which, according to Associated Press dispatches, the people have suffered greatly as a result of these floods. But at the headwaters of a river is the proper place to correct the trouble. The upper stretches of the Susquehanna and Chenango Rivers are the real cause for the major floods down below in various localities of Pennsylvania, a fact of which the citizens of those parts must by this time be well aware.

Mr. Chairman, I urge at this time that the committee give my statement serious consideration so that the situation may be corrected as soon as possible.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASE of Scuth Dakota. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr TABER. Mr. Chairman, there are some things which I feel should be called to the attention of the committee. On pages 783 and 784, Maj. Gen. M. A. Reckord, Adjutant General of Maryland, Commanding General, 29th Division, National Guard, and Executive Vice President, National Rifle Association, was being examined by the committee with reference to the Garand rifle.

General Reckord said:

> Last year, for instance, we had 200 of the new M–1 rifles—the Garand rifle—in the school.
> Everyone who had taken the course in the secondary school and had moved up to the primary school was compelled to take instruction in the operation and the firing of the new rifle.
>
> * * * * * * *
> Mr. SNYDER. Then you have used some of these new rifles?
>
> General RECKORD. Two hundred of them were made available last year.
>
> Mr. SNYDER. How did you find them as to their efficiency and effectiveness?
>
> General RECKORD. They are not as accurate as the Springfield; they do not compare favorably with the Springfield as to accuracy.
>
> Mr. SNYDER. At the same range?
>
> General RECKORD. I would say at any given range the Springfield is perhaps more accurate, and at the longer ranges the Springfield is definitely more accurate.
> * * * * * * *

Mr. POWERS. To what reason do you attribute the new semi-automatic not being as accurate as the Springfield?

General RECKORD. There are a number of contributing factors: The front sight is crude, the gas cylinder cap on the end of the muzzle, the design of the receiver, and the manner by which the gas chamber is attached to the barrel, all probably contribute.

Then I wish to call attention to an article from the American Rifleman that appears on page 614 of the hearings, having been inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. I shall not read from this editorial, but I wish to call attention to it.

I also wish to call attention to pages 609 and 610 of the hearings, where General Wesson, Chief of Ordnance, was being examined by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER], the chairman of the subcommittee. A number of questions were read, and General Wesson said in part:

In combat firing, targets are fleeting and as indistinct as the enemy can make them. The terrain and light conditions are variable and usually unfavorable. The ranges are unknown, and the time available for estimating them is practically nil. There is no time for setting sights. Another important fact, of course, is that the enemy is usually returning the fire.

Mr. POWERS. Are you reading that statement?

General WESSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWERS. You have a prepared answer?

Mr. SNYDER. I asked the general to be prepared to answer this and two other questions I intended to ask. After General Reckord made his statement the other day, I told General Wesson that we must have him back at some future date.

Mr. POWERS. And you have prepared answers to the questions?

General WESSON. Yes, sir.

There follows a long dissertation on these rifles. This new automatic rifle is perhaps one of the most contentious problems that face the Army. Large funds are being provided here to increase the number of them. We have now upward of 100,000 of these rifles and have under contract a very, very large number of them. It seems to me that the very thing we ought not to do in this kind of a hearing, a hearing upon an appropriation bill to provide for the national defense, is to inform the generals of the Army of the questions that are to be asked with reference to such a matter. We should go just as far as we can to get at the truth of these situations. We should in some way or another get at the things that will enable us best to prepare our national defense. We should not permit bureaucrats to be provided in advance an opportunity to make up their minds as to just what they are going to say to explain the recommendations they have suggested the committee follow. I hope that as the Congress approaches this problem it will inform itself on this subject and will very carefully and very sincerely study the question of what should be done with reference to this new Garand rifle. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, for the last 20 years we Americans have been deluged with a constant stream of propaganda designed to disparage the motives which inspired our entry into the last World War, to lower our national pride, and to destroy our national self-confidence. Since the situation in Europe has become acute, this deluge of propaganda has been much intensified. Those engaged in spreading this propaganda proceed on the principle that if a statement is made often enough and kept in constant circulation it will be accepted by the gullible as the truth, regardless of whether or not it is so. Therefore, they keep in constant circulation such stories as those claiming our entrance into the World War was due to the desire of our Wall Street bankers and our munition manufacturers to profit through the sale of munitions. They depict us as a helpless and, indeed, as an almost imbecilic nation handed over, body and soul, to the wily intrigues of the Old World diplomats by the so-called merchants of death.

This propaganda was so effective that it instigated an official investigation of the munitions industry. Nothing was developed to substantiate the often-repeated charges which instigated the investigation, much to the bitter disappointment of the pro-German, the pacifist, and the communistic elements in the United States. The investigation did, however, produce much in the form of insinuation and innuendo. It did also result, as do so many official investigations, in creating a lucrative demand for at least one of the principles on the lecture platform. It certainly did not make the task of providing for the common defense any easier for the Congress. There are those, of course, who regard this duty which is imposed upon the Congress by the Constitution as one of its very minor duties. They doubtless have reasons for this belief.

Among those who have united to decry the part we played in the last World War has been that strange union of Christian pacifists and Communists. With a basic philosophy, in each case, as far apart as the poles, they united to preach disarmament and to lift their hands in horror at the "crime of Versailles." Strange bedfellows, indeed. The Christian pacifist desired disarmament because he believed that making war impossible would permit the nobler nature of man to assert itself and hasten the millennium. The Communist preached peace at any price and disarmament in order to render all nations impotent and pave the way for the imposition of communism. I would think these strange allies of the Communists would hang their heads in shame at the mere thought of their former association.

As a matter of fact, the campaign to discredit the motives which caused our entry into the first World War began with the battle to defeat the League of Nations and to elect President Harding. It started as a mere political matter. It was then eagerly seized upon by the pro-German influences in this Nation, which were looking 20 years ahead to a Mein Kampf. The Communists and pacifists recognized it as a made-to-order sounding board for their irresponsible ravings. It was then used as a subterfuge to salve the conscience of all the draft dodgers and malingerers, who had managed by devious wiles to escape the discharge of one of the duties of a citizen. It was timely and took the Nation by storm because it was never opposed.

We entered the war in 1917, as we said, to make the world safe for democracy. That was our reason as nearly as anyone could state it. We had faith in certain ideals which had come to us mainly from France and England. They did not come from Russia or Prussia. They were part of our heritage. They came with our common law, our religion, our art, our literature, and our institutions of government. All of our social, economic, political, and religious philosophy had been builded around Magna Carta, Adam Smith, Shakespeare, Thomas Paine, Voltaire, Lafayette, and the King James Bible.

We had observed that Germany, not France or England, had invaded Belgium. The war was being fought on French soil and by no stretch of the imagination could France be classed as the aggressor. Great Britain did not announce a campaign of unrestricted sea warfare and proceed to sink merchant ships regardless of the innocent passengers. There was no instance where either England or France endeavored to stir up trouble between us and Mexico. We could see that Germany made little effort to conceal her plans to make France pay the cost of the war and thus to crush her permanently. The treaty of peace following the Franco-Prussian War was recent enough to be remembered by many of us. It was the German boast that she intended to demand the surrender of the British Fleet and thus bring England humbly to her knees.

We made up our minds that we would much prefer to live in a world which was not dominated by the philosophy of Potsdam. Such an event would have altered life in the United States too radically. We did not believe we could continue to exist as a free nation if the Allies lost the war. When this belief became common to the press, the pulpit, and the public there was an almost universal demand upon our officials that we enter the war. We did so and in no small measure contributed toward the defeat of the Central Powers.

When it came to making peace, Woodrow Wilson endeavored to provide for a lasting one. Such an achievement would indeed have been heartily welcomed by a war-weary world. Whether or not his plan was too idealistic we do not know. Our former Allies were willing to give it a trial. They all accepted it, as did nearly every other nation in the world. We did not. Partisan politics stood in the way. The American people seemed to believe more strongly in the efficacy of prayer than of work. They prayed for a world of peace brought about by the labor of others. The cry of pulling England's chestnuts out of the fire was heard. We broke away from our former Allies and attempted to dictate the peace. We made a separate peace and then presumed to criticize the terms desired by France—terms designed to preserve the peace of that section of Europe. Have not recent events shown us our mistakes? If not, then indeed are we either blind or superstubborn.

Of course, in remaking the map of central Europe mistakes were made. Since mankind is prone to err, perfection was too much to be expected. It was an era of budding idealism. In setting up nations too much importance was given to religious and not enough to economic considerations. To satisfy the popular demand industrialism was sacrificed in order to advance democracy. Western Europe essayed to force their political institutions upon central Europe before the people were ready for them. The inability of the League of Nations to maintain the 1919 map of Europe was quite likely due to the absence of the guiding hand of the nation which furnished the inspiration responsible for its establishment. The belief that we have no concern in the affairs of Europe will disappear in direct ratio to the narrowing of the Atlantic Ocean by modern mechanical progress.

Although the peace following the World War did fail to extend democracy, the winning of the war by the Allies, to which we contributed in no small measure, did prevent democracy from perishing. We accomplished our primary objective, which was to protect this Nation from the disastrous consequences of an allied defeat. The manner in which the nations, which have unfortunately fallen under the iron heel of Germany during the past 2 years, have been dealt with, is proof enough of how the Allies would have fared if they had lost in 1918.

Now, in regard to the Treaty of Versailles, which Hitler has so often called the crime of Versailles. Get it and read it. Judge for yourselves. It is printed in Senate Document No. 49, first session, Sixty-sixth Congress. Then read the terms of the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, one of the most ruthless treaties of history. Compare them as to their harshness. If Germany had won, have we any reason to believe that she would have been any more lenient with Great Britain, which nation she hated; or France, which nation she feared; than she was with Russia? Does anyone maintain our future would have been more secure in that case?

Oh, yes; in the Treaty of Versailles, Germany was to reimburse Belgium and France for damages due to the war, much of which was wanton in character. Was there anything wrong with that? After all, Germany was the aggressor. When it was decided that the terms were too severe, they were scaled down several times. Germany begged off from being forced to make restitution for just claims for damages, but at the same time found the money necessary to build one of the most powerful military machines in history. Has she thereby contributed toward the peace of the world or the advance of democracy?

European boundaries were established, and Austria, Poland, and Czechoslovakia were established as nations. By the terms of the treaty, Germany agreed to recognize the complete independence of those nations. In order to further provide for the safety of these nations, Germany was disarmed to the point where she could not again become an aggressor. In violation of this treaty she rearmed and proceeded to acquire this very territory by force of arms. Is this not sufficient proof of the justice of this part of the treaty?

In order that France might be free of the threat of a repetition of the holocaust of 1914–18, which laid one-seventh of that nation in ruins, the Rhineland was demilitarized. That provision of the treaty was as openly violated as was all of its other provisions. Would not the security of France be more assured today if the Rhine River was a part of the Maginot Line?

Alsace and Lorraine were restored to France. Could any reasonable person object to that? Read the provisions in the Treaty of Versailles dealing with the treatment of the inhabitants of German extraction or of German property in the Saar, Schleswig, Danzig, and other territory with which the treaty is concerned. Compare the terms stated there with the treatment of minorities and property in the nations recently raped by Hitler. See if there is any comparison in that respect.

It is true that Germany lost colonies, ships, money, territory, prestige, and many other more or less valuable assets by the terms of this treaty. It is also true that she lost the war. If she had won the war, she would have conducted herself in the manner of a victor. She most certainly assumed the attitude of the victor in 1871. After all, since she began the war, could she reasonably have expected to escape unscathed? This much is true: Her own territory proper was practically untouched by the war. She suffered the least by the war of any nation engaged in it.

Most of the propaganda since the war has been anti-British in form but pro-German in reality. It has been said that we fought to pull England's chestnuts out of the fire. We did not do so, and have never done so. The assertion has repeatedly been made that England will always fight to the last Frenchman. At the end of the last World War the British general reserve consisted of eight divisions of troops, the men of which were less than 18 years of age. This was certainly fighting to the last Britisher. No soldier who has ever fought the British ever accused them of lack of valor. Dispensers of propaganda, however, are not soldiers. Now we hear amateur strategists tell how England failed Ethiopia, China, Czechoslovakia, and Finland. Give any of them a map, and ask him to show you how England could have come to their assistance. England, it must be remembered, is a democracy, and not an autocracy. She can only function as a democracy, even when confronted by a world crisis. Oh, now I hear the remark—what about the democracy of British India? I would like to hear any intelligent person dispute the fact that British rule has brought incalculable benefits in health, hygiene, political freedom, food, housing, and education to India. Where is the informed person who would maintain that India, with her many castes, religions, and races, could function as a democracy, or maintain her independence, if she were a free nation?

Now I believe it is time that we as Americans should begin to have a pride in our national achievements. I believe it is time we should think for ourselves in regard to our foreign affairs. We have listened too long to our pseudo-intellectuals, parlor pinks, and professional isolationists who wish to fasten upon us a policy of self-abasement, and brand us as diplomatic morons. In their egotistic ignorance, they say we always lost our peace conferences and diplomatic dealings. Let us analyze this statement, and no longer close our eyes to the facts. Did we lose the peace conference following the Revolutionary War? Or the War of 1812? Or the Mexican War? Or the Spanish-American War? If so, let these moronic intellectuals state what we lost. Have we anything to be ashamed of in our dealings with the Barbary pirates? What about the Louisiana Purchase, and the Purchase of Alaska? Were we suckers there? Who believes we lost our shirt when we acquired Florida or Texas? Can these transactions be compared to taking "wooden nickels"? Not on our part, at least. Just how severely did we get skinned in the dispute with Great Britain over the boundary of Maine, or the boundary of Oregon, or the Alabama Claims?

What about the question of Maximilian in Mexico? The Alaskan fisheries controversy? Or the Venezuelan crisis in 1895? What about our acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands? All those incidents in our history are indisputable facts to which every red-blooded American can point with pride. They are not myths, but are as real and as substantial as our glorious achievements in every war in which we have ever engaged. As a matter of fact, the only real national skinning we ever received was a result of the demands of those who were responsible for the unsound pacifist program following the World War. For once, we listened to those evil spirits, and the Disarmament Conference which they directed was a disaster without parallel in the history of the world.

Let us hold up our heads with pride when we think of our part in the last World War. Let us stop talking this nonsense about being "bamboozled" by wily foreign diplomats. We entered the war with the purest of motives. Our conduct in the war was in every way above reproach. We fought to preserve to the world those ideals which we believe make life worth while; because we believed that a world in which these ideals were safe was the only safe world for ourselves and our posterity. To say that we were fooled or duped into the war, or that our conduct was other than that of which the Nation could or should be proud, is a libel to our national traditions, an affront to the national intelligence, integrity, and statesmanship of that epoch in our history, and an insult to the self-sacrifice and patriotism of the men who served in the armed forces of the Nation at that time. [Applause.] Let us throw off this repentant spirit of self-abasement, which has been forced upon us, and think once more of America with a pride in our achievements of the past; and a confidence in our own ability to do our own thinking about our foreign affairs, and to provide for our future as ably as we have provided for our past. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], who just spoke, suggested that in foreign affairs we should do our own thinking. It would be well if we did our own thinking in connection with our domestic affairs. It would be well if we not only thought but if we formed and passed upon our own conclusions, instead of listening to some of the fine-sounding but impracticable plans advanced.

All too often people are swayed by a play for a certain objective and lose sight of the practical difficulties in the way of the achievement of their objective and endeavor to take short cuts which they think will bring prosperity and happiness. All too often these short cuts produce more harm than good. Time and again I have listened to those who said that our great need was for an increased purchasing power so that the goods of the producers and manufacturers might be purchased at a profit and consumed with benefit to all. No doubt about the desirability of that, but the taking from one group of the purchasing power which they have and giving it to another does not increase the purchasing power of the whole, and all too often the purchasing power stripped from the one group and given to another group has been taken from a group which was creating and giving employment and placed in the hands of those who merely spent and consumed.

The Members of this House are wholly in sympathy with labor. Spurred on by the demands of labor organizations and of so-called labor leaders, we have enacted legislation, the purpose of which was to aid labor, to better its conditions, to give it more of the good things of life. Too frequently the laws placed upon the books for the purpose of aiding labor have injured it; sometimes such legislation, while freeing the workingman from the control of the employer, has placed him at the mercy of the labor boss who has assessed him and used him for political and financial advancement.

Little real progress is made by denying to a Knudsen the privilege or right to operate General Motors, and placing the control of production in the hands of a Lewis. Knudsen's corporation, at least, furnishes a job and pays wages. Lewis' corporation, while ostensibly acting for the benefit of the individual employee, sometimes gets him out of a job and deprives him of his pay check. Lewis' organization charges him for the privilege of working, telling him when he can work and when he must strike. Lewis' organization assesses him for payments to aid in organizing other industries, to pay strikers and pickets, and to maintain a highly paid organization, where the offices are held, not by workers but by professional, political labor leaders who draw good salaries, have a big expense account, and live in luxury, just as do the Knudsens. There is this difference, however, that the Knudsens and their kind, as stated above, furnish jobs and pay wages; they do something constructive. The Lewises, at best, must live out of and upon the wage checks of the workers.

I have found it extremely difficult to know very much about some of the legislation which comes before the House; this is because there are so many bills, and the scope of the various bills is so great that one man cannot possibly, by personal investigation, learn the merits or demerits of each proposed act. Hence, it has come about that many of us rely upon our colleagues for information.

During the past 2 years, it has been my purpose to become familiar with the decisions of the N. L. R. B. and of the courts, also. From the reports printed in the papers, and from conversations carried on with individuals, including employees, employers, businessmen generally, farmers, and those who are trying to live upon the savings of a lifetime, much information has been gotten.

More recently, the hearings before the Smith committee and, within the last few days, the report of the committee, have thrown a great deal of light not only upon the operation of the N. L. R. A. but upon the activities of the Board itself. That committee has performed a difficult task in a highly efficient and unbiased manner. The report is worthy of the careful, painstaking perusal of every Member of the House. [Applause.]

It is my hope that when the proposed amendments to the N. L. R. A. come before this House, every Member will have read that report. Of late, from the floor of the House, we have heard a great deal of talk about unemployment. Both the President of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. have charged in no unmistakable terms that the present administration has taken no intelligent, effective steps to solve the problem of unemployment.

Just before coming upon the floor, I picked up the noon issue of one of the local dailies, and from it I quote this editorial:

UNEMPLOYED DOLLARS

The Chase National Bank of New York reports that its deposits on March 30 were $3,060,768,704—a new world's record for a commercial bank.

It is not, unfortunately, a record to be viewed with satisfaction. The reports from banks in many cities, showing deposits at higher levels than ever before, are more exact than the estimates of men unemployed, but hardly less disturbing. For a large proportion of these dollars are unemployed dollars.

The Chase, for instance, had a "cash position" of $1,522,549,671, indicating a situation common to all large banks—that deposits are increasing much more rapidly than they can be lent and put to work. It had nearly another billion in Government, State, and local securities. But it had out, in loans and discounts, only a little more than one-fifth of its total deposits. That is superliquidity, making for great safety but not for business activity.

The unemployment of men and the unemployment of dollars are twin problems, and every needless obstacle to the employment of dollars is an obstacle to the employment of men.

The point I want to make now is that this vast sum in the Chase National Bank of New York and other large sums in other banks lie idle and unemployed, as sterile as the billions of dollars' worth of gold buried in the Kentucky hills. These funds are in the banks because the men who would operate factories and give employment, who would create and carry on business enterprises, are afraid to make the venture. They are afraid because the Government and the Government agents, snooping, witch-hunting, persecuting them, are after them from morning until night.

The President it was who said—and he referred to businessmen generally, he indicted the whole class—I quote:

I should like to have it said of my first administration that, in it, the forces of selfishness and of lust for power met their match. I should like to have it said of my second administration that, in it, these forces met their master.

That has been the attitude of the President and his advisers from the first year of his administration down to the present moment. Hopkins, Tugwell, and the rest of the wrecking crew have each contributed their bit toward forcing the unemployment question to be always with us.

Here is a news item which concerns the owners of loft buildings in the city of New York. Stated briefly, the situation appears to be this: The owners of these buildings had made an agreement with their service employees, that is, with janitors, elevator operators, and the like, as to wages and hours of employment. Under this agreement, the employees were guaranteed a minimum of $29 a week, providing they worked 48 hours. But along came the Wage Administrator and the first thing he did was to hold that the employees of the owner of the building, that is, these janitors and elevator men, were engaged in interstate commerce—a tortured definition which doubtless no Member of Congress ever intended to write into the law.

Then, having found that the employees were engaged in interstate commerce or in work which affected interstate commerce, he now holds that each and every one is entitled now to receive compensation at time and a half for all of the overtime he has put in in excess of the 42 hours fixed by law; this notwithstanding the fact that the men had agreed in consideration of higher wages to work the longer time. The result of that sort of a rule will be this, that the employer, rather than pay this man wages of $29 a week will employ more men but for shorter hours. He will employ two shifts, and none will make more than a bare living.

A good thing, you say, to spread the employment. Something may be said for that argument but it is an argument which prevents the accumulation of the funds to purchase a home or to invest in some other business, to give employment to others through the accumulation and savings of wages. It means that you force the employer, because he cannot pay time and a half at the highest rate to which his employees have agreed to as just stated, to put on two shifts, or the other alternative is to add the cost of increase in wages to the cost of the goods and start the increase on nothing more nor less than a circle of increase, so that, when it comes back to the place from which it started, no one has benefited. So much for the interpretation of the wage-hour law. It is just an illustration from which you can derive a thought if you choose.

Now, in the other branch of the Labor Department activities is this National Labor Relations Board and the act itself. It is almost impossible to get the Members of the House to consider the proposed amendments. It is customary for so many of those who oppose these amendments to say that everyone offering an amendment is a foe of labor or proposes to destroy the act.

The House Committee on Labor today voted to report out H. R. 9195 by a vote of 7 to 11. At least three attempts were made in the committee to adopt an amendment abolishing the Board but we were unsuccessful, so that question will come before the House. Abolishing the Board, in my judgment, is not an emasculating procedure though the attitude of some of the committee, as just stated, seems to be that anyone who proposes an amendment is ipso facto an enemy of labor.

This attitude perhaps is expressed as well as it can be by the statement of the chairman of the Labor Committee, the Representative from New Jersey [MARY T. NORTON], through a notation which I find in the same issue of the local paper to which I just made reference. She is there quoted as saying:

> The House has the choice of accepting our amendments or considering others that could destroy the effect and operations of the law.

She has no reason for the broad general statement that amendments other than those adopted by her committee will "destroy the effect and the operation of the law." Her assumption and the assumption of those who agree with her seem to be that the law is perfect. Even the Constitution, which has been characterized as a masterpiece, the peak of intellectual achievement of man, has been found to be in need of amending, and certainly experience has demonstrated that the N. L. R. A. is anything but perfect.

The committee today, by a vote of 7 to 11, voted down a motion to abolish the Board and give the President authority to appoint by and with the consent of the Senate a new five-man Board.

On the 26th of last month I wrote the president of the American Federation of Labor asking him to state his position as to the abolition of the present Board. That letter read as follows:

MARCH 26, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM GREEN,
President, the American Federation of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GREEN: In the New York Times of March 25, 1939, you are quoted as saying, that the N. L. R. B.—

"Through decisions clearly in favor of the C. I. O. and against the American Federation of Labor, is working out the destruction of the American Federation of Labor."

The Baltimore Sun of May 8, 1939, quotes Padway as advocating before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor three amendments that would accomplish the following purposes:

"That coercion and restraint of employees and employers be forbidden.

"That mere expressions of opinion by employers or employees shall not be outlawed but that expressions of opinions by employers must not be accompanied by threats or discrimination."

The United Press on June 13, 1939, quoted you as charging that the Labor Board was establishing precedents which perverted the meaning of the law and "unless Congress meets the public demand for constructive changes, there is grave danger that the pendulum now swinging altogether too far to the right may manifest itself in the next Congress and result in destruction of the act."

You are also quoted on May 1, 1939, as urging that the present Board of three members be abolished and a new Board of five members be created.

The Associated Press of May 10, 1939, quoted you as stating that you insisted upon a change in the law which would "abolish the present three-man Board and replace it with a five-man agency."

No. 24, volume 29, of Labor, purports to carry a statement by you in which, among other things, you refer to a report of your executive council at the Houston 1938 convention. I quote from your article:

"Our suggestions for caution have gone unheeded. The administration of the act has not been in competent and impartial hands. On the contrary, flagrant bias and prejudice exists on the part of the members of the Board, as is evidenced by decisions which attempt to undermine and destroy American Federation of Labor unions.

"The opposition of the American Federation of Labor is fundamental. Stated generally, our opposition to the Board is that in deciding cases it has established precedents whereby the so-called economic philosophy of one labor group is encouraged and sustained, while that of another is suppressed and even obliterated."

As a member of the House Committee on Labor charged with the responsibility of voting on the question of reporting to the House on the question of proposed amendments to the N. L. R. A., will you be so kind as to write a letter, either to the press or to the chairman of the Labor Committee, the Honorable MARY T. NORTON, stating plainly whether the A. F. of L. now favors the abolition of the present Board and the creating of one composed entirely of new members.

A direct and clear answer to this question will be appreciated, I am sure, by many Members of the House.

Respectfully yours,

CLARE E. HOFFMAN.

To that letter, I have been advised, he replied, directing his reply to each member of the committee. The letter I received reads as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1940.

Hon. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am pleased to reply to the inquiry submitted in your letter dated March 26.

The American Federation of Labor favors the abolition of the present Labor Relations Board because we are convinced that it is biased, prejudiced, and is guilty of maladministration of the National Labor Relations Act.

If, however, Congress refuses to abolish the present Board and create a new one, we are willing to accept an arrangement which provides for an increase of the present Board to five members, and through such action add two additional members to the present Board.

I have endeavored to answer your inquiry in a direct and clear way, as you requested.

The quotations made in your letter of statements made by me as president of the American Federation of Labor are correct.

With all good wishes, I beg to remain,

Sincerely yours,

WM. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

When you have a labor organization with some 4,000,000 members and you have the president of that organization saying that the Board which is charged with the administration of the act is biased and prejudiced, which seems to be the opinion of the general public, and when we remember that there are only, at the outside, some 8,000,000 organized workers in this country out of a total of more than 40,000,000, why should not this House, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested a little while ago—do our own thinking?

Rightly or wrongly, justly or unjustly, that Board has lost the confidence of the people. I suggest again that every Member of this House read the report of the Smith committee, if you have not done so, and then go back and check in the hearings of that committee every single statement that is made in the Smith report, and you will find proof—not from some outside witness; not from someone who is prejudiced or biased—but you will find the proof from the records of the Board itself; from the testimony of Madden, the Chairman of the Board; from the testimony of the Board's employees, substantiating every charge that the Smith committee makes.

I want to pause here for a moment to say again that the committee has done a wonderfully fine, impartial, and thorough job, and there is no question about it [applause], and they recommend the abolition of this Board.

As I was saying a moment ago, the Board, rightly or wrongly, justly or unjustly, having lost the confidence of the people generally, its usefulness as an administrative agency has been destroyed. You cannot get away from it, and if we do our own thinking and if we follow our own judgment as well as the wishes of our constituents, we will abolish this Board when this bill comes up; get rid of them and get a new Board.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HARTLEY. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that the action of the Labor Committee this morning in reporting out a bill which merely provides for the addition of two new members to the present Board, in substance, is vindicating or whitewashing the present Board?

Mr. HOFFMAN. In my judgment—and, of course, this is only my personal opinion—that is an admission of one of two things, either that the administration of the Board has been wrong, that the Board has been incompetent, or biased, or something of that kind; or that the committee hopes to throw that concession to the House in order to prevent more drastic amendments.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota rose.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was just going to ask the gentleman if he thought packing the Board was any solution whatever, because the Board might be packed again?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, no; it is not the remedy, but, then, I think the President of the United States is too shrewd a politician to give us again a Board that would do the things that the present Board has done.

Going further with this letter, President Green said:

> If, however, Congress refuses to abolish the present Board and create a new one, we are willing to accept an arrangement which provides for an increase of the present Board to five members, and through such action add two additional members to the present Board.

But, as practically everyone is agreed—except the Board members—that they have made a mess of this thing, why should we not get rid of them and be done with it?

That is not the only amendment that we should have. The sponsors of this law have told us time and time again that they want to give employees the right to bargain through representatives of their own choosing. Long ago I suggested an amendment, and it is in a bill that I introduced on the 13th of March 1939, H. R. 4990, to add four little words to section 7. Section 7 provides, in substance, that employees shall be free to join, and so forth, labor organizations. The four little words that I want to put in there are these, "or not to join."

Section 7 would then read:

> Employees shall have the right to form, join, or not to join, or assist labor organizations to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing—

And so forth. The only change is the addition of the four words "or not to join," so that the law as it stands today may be stated in the act, this because the Board has taken upon itself to use the act as an instrument to compel employees to join unions; not only that but, as the A. F. of L. contends, to force employees to join the C. I. O. rather than the A. F. of L.

What is the objection to adding those words to the act? As a matter of fact, employees are supposed to have, and they legally have, that right now; and that is the answer of those who oppose that amendment. They say, Why do something that is not necessary? But it is necessary. It is necessary for this reason: That here in America, supposedly a free country, many and many a man and woman has been deprived of the right to work until he or she shall have joined an organization, and an organization not of their choice. That is not the statement of a conclusion; that is the statement of a fact.

In strike after strike picket lines have been thrown around factories, and after the labor struggle has been settled by a contract for collective bargaining, in more than one instance a picket line has been thrown around a factory for the purpose of preventing men going to work until their dues were paid up to date or until they joined the union. Does this Congress want to take the position, by refusing to adopt such an amendment, that no longer here in these United States shall a man be free to go to work until he has put his name on the dotted line, until he has paid dues? Is that the doctrine that we want to advance by way of inaction?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. While it is pretty generally known that the Committee on Labor is unwilling to change the Wagner Act in any manner other than is indicated by the action of the committee in the last 2 or 3 days, I feel it is quite safe to give the gentleman assurance that the whole subject matter will be opened up for full discussion and that this House will have an opportunity to assert its will on the subject of amending the law. It is my opinion that this House will adopt the Smith amendment, and all of the Smith amendments, by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is fine; but the Smith amendments do not go far enough. They do not give the man who labors the right to go to his job without interference. Does not the gentleman believe that if an American wants to work and has a job that he is satisfied with that he should have that privilege?

Mr. COX. Of course, I agree with the gentleman, and I go much further probably than the gentleman is willing to go.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then the gentleman will have to go a very long way.

Mr. COX. I think the law is a tremendous mistake; that it should never have been put on the statute books.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am glad to have the gentleman's statement about how far he is willing to go; but I hope—and express my hope because my sympathies are, as I believe the sympathies of every man in this House are, with labor. I hope that when this bill comes before the House we will write a bill which will protect the man who actually works. As a matter of fact, this bill protects the labor organizers, the labor officials. It does not protect the employee. I can cite half a dozen cases in the circuit court of appeals and one or two in the Supreme Court of the United States where the Court says explicitly that the act does not give collective bargaining to the employees through representatives of their own choosing; that the act defeats the very purpose announced in section 7.

When this bill comes in I want to offer another amendment. The law provides that these employees shall have the right to organize—and skipping the words of the statute, retaining the substance—organize free from coercion on the part of the employer. What difference does it make to men who work whether the coercion comes from the employer or comes from some labor-union boss? In either event he is out of his job until he does the will of some third person.

So I want to insert in this law a provision that an employee shall have the right to organize and carry on his union activities free from coercion from any source, whether it be from a politician, a minister of the gospel, a magician, an economist, or a new dealer, or whether it is a labor boss who tries to force him to pay dues before he can go to work. There are other amendments:

Here is another one: This act defines a "labor dispute," and the courts in construing that have accepted the same definition that is given to a "labor dispute" as used in the Norris-LaGuardia Act. Under the construction of the court in those cases you have a labor dispute whether there is a controversy between the man who is the employer and the man who works, or whether there is none; whether the relationship of employer and employee exists or whether it does not exist. Take the New Negro Alliance case here in Washington—and there are several other cases. There the point at issue was whether a storekeeper should hire an increased number of colored clerks. The New Negro Alliance never had a member who worked in this grocery company's stores. Not one. They never had had any business dealings with those stores, and yet, when they threw a picket line around that store to force them to employ more Negro clerks, the Supreme Court of the United States said that under the Norris-LaGuardia Act—and the same definition has been given to a labor dispute under the N. L. R. A.—that there was a labor dispute.

Now, since that decision Wisconsin has changed its law, and the courts of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio have repudiated that decision in construing State statutes having practically the same language. Nevertheless, the definition of a labor dispute remains the same today.

My proposition is that when that bill comes before us we say that a labor dispute cannot exist unless it exists between employer and employee, where there is the relation of employer and employee; that no third person can come in and create a labor dispute.

I shall offer an amendment to subsection 9 of section 2, which is entitled "Definitions," striking out the words "regardless of whether" and inserting "provided" in their place, so that labor dispute will be defined as follows:

> The term "labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, provided the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I call your attention to this illustration that you have right here in Washington. It is not more than a thousand feet over to the Methodist Building. The Methodist Building is within 300 feet of the Supreme Court of the United States. "Equal justice under law" is the motto on the front of the Supreme Court Building. Right down there in the shadow of that building are pickets parading every day at noon and at night. Is there a labor dispute? If there is, between whom? Not between the employees of the woman who operates that cafeteria and the woman herself. The labor dispute is between Mink, head of the union, and 13 of the 28 employees have joined the union, but they are all working, and the employees who do not want to spend their pay checks with Mink for the right to work. None of them is making demands, asking for wages, changes in working conditions. But Brother Mink, head of the union, insists that he wants to bargain with her, while her employees are satisfied, and he lies about the dispute on the placards that he has in the hands of the pickets before the building.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. In that connection, I think the gentleman would be interested to know that I had occasion to stop one of these pickets the other night and question him. I asked him, "Is there a labor dispute going on here?" He said, "I don't know." I said, "Is there labor trouble here?" He said, "I don't know anything about it. I am from Virginia. I hired out to work today to carry a banner." That is the situation over there.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is right. You can go over there and talk to these pickets yourself. They are the hired pickets of Mink, not of the employees; they are on the picket line, picketing for some union boss, and they do not know anything about what the picketing is all about. There is no labor dispute in the business.

How much longer, under the guise of protecting labor through the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act and the activities of the N. L. R. B., will we permit labor—and when I say labor I mean the women and men who work—to be the victims of those who are exploiting them to a far greater degree than did the most tyrannical employer? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] such time as he may desire.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, that we should have adequate national defense is a subject which no one will deny except those who think so little of our form of government as to be indifferent to whether it continues or not. It can profit nothing to attempt argument with this class of people. The subject remaining for debate, then, is what constitutes adequate national defense. The defense of the Nation is a highly specialized profession, as much so as any other profession known to the world. The Army of the United States possesses the finest corps of officers ever assembled in any army. They are experts on the subject to which they have devoted their lives. Under our democratic system they have not become militaristic, as in the case in many foreign countries. Rather they are concerned about putting this Nation in position to defend itself. So long as they remain so, they are safe leaders to follow in matters of defense. The bill now before the Committee has met with their approval and is a part of their program which, when completed, will adequately defend this Nation.

Many in this body, no doubt, when the present program came forward, were fearful that the Nation might be plunged into a vast arming program; that a large standing army might be created, and that this Nation might abandon its tradition of maintaining a small standing army capable of forming the nucleus of and expanding into an effective army capable of meeting any potential enemy. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I was gratified when the War Department came before the committee and outlined a reasonable program; one which asked for no increase in the authorized strength of the Army, but only that personnel be brought up to authorizations. Such an army will be capable of expanding into the character of force necessary for any emergency. That is, it can so expand provided material, equipment, and armament are on hand and immediately available for the use of the expanded force. Such is the plan and program that this Congress has adopted. It contemplates the acquisition of armaments, munitions, airplanes, and strategic materials, all to be held in readiness for the emergency we all hope never occurs. In the meantime a small, well-trained army is in training so as to provide a reservoir of men comparable to the reservoir of material being acquired. This means training of the forces. We are all pleased to know of the plans now under way for the maneuvers in Texas and Louisiana this spring, which will serve as a fitting climax to the smaller maneuvers which have been held through the winter. It is to be hoped that in time adequate training grounds will be available at all times for these purposes.

It is gratifying to know that the program for the development of Air Corps training fields is carried on, and reasonably extended, by the appropriations carried by this bill. A project of particular importance is the sum of slightly less than a million dollars carried in this bill for the purpose of continuing improvements at Kelly Field, Tex. This is truly a historical field for here in the early days of the World War the infant Air Corps began its training program. Long neglected during the years while the country pursued a policy which would indicate that we thought there would soon be no need for an air corps in our Army. Fortunately we have recently awakened to the need of this station, about to fall apart by sheer age of wartime frame construction. There is now under construction at Kelly Field approximately $3,018,800 of modern permanent buildings designed for Air Corps training purposes, and containing the latest in facilities. The appropriation in this bill will carry on this program during the ensuing year, and will provide for two hangars, administration building, guard house, quartermaster garage, and photographic laboratory.

The hearings reflect that this amount is but a portion of the improvements to be constructed. Dependent upon appropriations by Congress, construction of additional buildings will complete Kelly Field into the character of flying school which the advanced training course of our Air Corps should be. The program calls for an additional $5,367,375. It will provide such necessary buildings as hangars, gymnasium, chapel, post exchange, laundries, and quarters.

Kelly Field is located in the one portion of the country found by experience to be ideal for the training of Army pilots. It is adjacent to Randolph Field, the West Point of the air, the primary flying school of the Army. It is to be hoped that this program will be carried to completion without delay.

Of equal importance is the sum of $708,000 provided by this bill for permanent construction at Brooks Field. This field is much smaller than Randolph and Kelly, and fills an entirely different mission with the Army. It is located near Fort Sam Houston, Tex., the home of the famous Second Division, and headquarters for the Eighth Corps Area. Necessarily the training fields come under the direct jurisdiction of the Chief of the Air Corps. Their functions have no relation to the combat troops such as the Second Division and the Eighth Corps Area. The Air Corps must operate as an integral part of the Army, and in conjunction with troops of all other arms, this must be true in time of peace if it is to work smoothly in time of war. Brooks Field serves as the station for the combat squadrons operated in conjunction with the troops in the Eighth Corps Area. This field is now composed of frame buildings erected during the World War, now in a deplorable state of repair. The funds provided in this bill will construct hangar; paved apron; grading and drainage; communications building; beacon building; paint, oil, and dope warehouse; magazines; photographic laboratory; barracks for enlisted men; officers' quarters; noncommissioned officers' quarters, and utilities.

These will be barely adequate to provide modern living quarters and modern airplane facilities for the Air Corps troops stationed at Brooks Field.

This bill is a fair, reasonable, and sensible contribution to the program of national defense, and I trust will pass.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON].

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, the proposed Big Bend National Park is located in Brewster County, Tex., in my congressional district. The area is bounded on the south by the Big Bend of the Rio Grande, from which circumstance the park derives its name.

The Big Bend is literally what the name implies, and a glance at the map will make this clear. On one side of the river lies the United States, and on the other Mexico. Mexico has set aside for park purposes a large area contiguous to the land on our side and this international park is dedicated to peace.

The park in Brewster County comprises an area of approximately 736,000 acres. In May 1935 a bill of which I am the author, was passed in Congress providing for the establishment of the Big Bend Park in the State of Texas. This act made no mention of funds for purchase of the necessary land, as it is against the policy of the Federal Government to appropriate money to buy land for national park areas, it being expected that adequate appropriation by the State legislature will be made and supplemented by funds which shall be raised through private subscription.

I say it is against the policy of the Government to purchase land for national parks, and generally this is true. However, the Government made a substantial contribution to the fund for purchase of land in the Great Smoky Mountains National Park. I voted for that appropriation, as I felt that Federal funds could not be expended to a more worth-while end. I wish my colleagues would support me in an appropriation for the Big Bend Park. The people not only of my district but the entire State are making a vigorous campaign at this time to raise money to buy land for the Big Bend Park, but up to this time nothing like a sufficient amount has been raised. I also hope the Texas Legislature will do its fair share toward making this great project a reality by making an appropriation to aid in buying the land. A few years since the legislature did appropriate $750,000 for this purpose, but the bill was vetoed by Governor Allred on the ground that the financial condition of the State did not warrant the outlay. Governor O'Daniel has expressed interest in the project, and I very much hope he will use his effort to the end that funds may be made available at the next session of the legislature. The State should render full cooperation, and I believe will do so.

A vital need in the world today is cultural and economic understanding between nations, and an international peace park on our southern border would be a means of promoting contacts that would be not only interesting and instructive, but invaluable to the people of both countries.

The southernmost spur of the Rocky Mountains runs through the Big Bend country, the highest and most rugged peaks attaining an altitude of almost 8,000 feet. The Rio Grande here cuts through three canyons, the walls in places reaching a height of 3,000 feet.

Biologically as well as scenically this area presents features of absorbing interest. The varied forest cover is still virgin. The Chisos Mountains, surrounded on all sides by half-desert, are covered with trees far removed from forest types of like character. The National Park Service is authority for the statement that, according to botanical authorities, some of the trees of the Mexican area of this park are found nowhere else on this continent. Growths include chaparral, cactus, juniper, various oaks, mountain mahogany, Douglas fir, pine, cypress, and maple.

Many animals wander up from the wildernesses of Mexico into the Big Bend, which region has representatives of more than 60 species of mammals. Among the larger game animals are bear, mountain lions, wild hog, and several kinds of deer. Over 200 species of birds have been noted. I quote from a report on this section by the National Park Service, which has made an exhaustive examination of the area:

> The variety of geologic phenomena presented in this limited area is so great that illustrations can be found of almost every phase of the science. It is apparent that the Big Bend National Park, when established, will be recognized as one of the outstanding geological laboratories and classrooms of the world.

As our country nears the saturation point in population, we are forcibly reminded of the need of extensive recreation areas that shall be established in perpetuity. There are no more public lands that may be set aside for national park purposes and unless the Federal Government establishes the policy of acquiring areas of outstanding scenic aspects for such use, then our people must raise funds and buy them. As I have said, this is being done by the people of Texas, and we welcome all the help our neighbors will give us in the establishment of the Big Bend Park, which will be enjoyed by people from every section of our own country and travelers throughout the world.

I request the unanimous consent of the House for the insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks of an article on the Big Bend Park, written by Rev. Milton F. Hill, pastor of the Methodist Church at Pecos, Tex., and published in the El Paso Times of March 24. It is both interesting and informative, and Mr. Hill is one of the most prominent ministers in my State. [Applause.]

[From the El Paso Times of March 24, 1940]

To become a national park a region must have exceptional qualifications. It must be able to rank with Yosemite and the Grand Canyon, and Yellowstone, and Glacier, and Mount Rainier.

It is a little difficult for us to realize that right here at our back door is such a place. We have been in the habit of thinking of beautiful and picturesque places as being far, far away in some distant State, so that it is hard to realize that such conditions can be found here in our own State of Texas. But the national park people, who are familiar with the scenery of the entire Nation tell us that the Big Bend does qualify.

Let us clearly understand some things, however, at the very beginning. The Big Bend is a desert country, and the traveler who goes there should realize this fact. As most of us know, the region is very dry. It has some forest, but this is to be found only in the upper levels of the Chisos Mountains. The only stream is the Rio Grande, with the exception of Tornillo Creek and a few short streams in the higher Chisos.

When I was a college boy I worked one season in Yellowstone Park, and I remember how disappointed some tourists were because Yellowstone did not have flower beds with iron fences around them. That was their idea of a park. Someone might form an entirely wrong impression of the Big Bend Park. Its outstanding feature is grand and spectacular desert and mountain scenery, and it is a wonderful example of the unspoiled wilderness of the Southwest and of the health-giving atmosphere that goes with it.

TERRITORY OF PARK IS TREMENDOUS BASIN

The territory of the proposed park is a vast basin, roughly diamond shaped. The natural gateway to the park is Persimmon Gap, a notch in the wall of the Santiago Mountains. Through Persimmon Gap the Comanche Indians used to travel on their annual raids into Mexico. The gap is a little more than 40 miles south of Marathon, and when you have reached its highest point you get a remarkable view of the Big Bend country.

Directly south are the Rosillas Mountains, which rise nearly 3,000 feet above the plain at their base. On a clear morning these mountains are a fine purple red in color. To the east extend the Santiago Mountains and the foothills of the Dead Horse range.

Geologists tell us, by the way, that these two ranges bring together at the only place on the continent the two great mountain systems, the Rockies and the Appalachians. Out in the west are the ragged peaks of the Corazones, while directly south and towering above the Rosillas are the magnificent Chisos.

The road to the Chisos Mountains is in excellent condition, and as you travel the 35 miles from Persimmon Gap you are traveling a great plain. Soon you begin to get views of the Dead Horse Mountains. Beyond and far in the southeast you see a tower-like peak which rises from a great block of mountain. This is Shot Tower Peak in the Del Carmen Mountains of Mexico, and it rises 8,000 feet higher than the Rio Grande. The river cuts through these mountains to form the Boquillas Canyon.

CHISOS MOUNTAINS ARE HIGH AND RUGGED

But what attracts your attention now are the Chisos, and as you approach them you become more and more conscious of their height and ruggedness. Some miles before you reach them the road swings to the west and seems to be leaving the mountains. Then it turns south and leads directly into them.

Panther Peak, on the left, and Pulliam's Bluff, on the right, are tremendous portals for the gateway into the mountains. The road enters Green Gulch, an inadequate name for this beautiful canyon. On your right are the high crags and pinnacles of Lost Mine Peak, while directly ahead, like the towers of an immense feudal castle, rises Casa Grande.

You notice an abrupt change in the vegetation. The desert shrubs give place to oak, pinon, and cedar. Green Gulch has marvelously beautiful colored and sculptured rocks and cliffs. I have visited the Chisos fully 15 times, and each time this scene becomes more impressive and beautiful to me. Very fortunate is the visitor who sees the clouds when they hang low in the mountains and drift among the great cliffs and crags. I have seen them pour down through the clefts in immense cascades of white vapor.

As you descend from Green Gulch the road twists up the base of Casa Grande and climbs to the summit of the pass which looks west down into Oak Canyon and the basin. Down below you is the C. C. C. camp, where a company of boys are at work. The road hairpins down to the camp, which is as far as you can go in a car.

All around you are rugged mountains. To the west is the "Western Window," through which you can see the quicksilver-mining town, Terlingua, and beyond it the distant blue Bofecillas Mountains. Casa Grande towers above you in the east, while in the south is the highest summit of the Chisos, Mount Emory, its rugged sides covered with dense forest.

THREE BEAUTIFUL TRIPS AVAILABLE TO VISITORS

Three very fine trips can be made from here. The first is down Oak Canyon to the Western Window. You make your way through a narrow, winding gorge with springs and a beautiful little creek. Tremendous cliffs rise on each side. The window is an opening less than 6 feet wide, and during part of the year the stream drops through it, making a waterfall 300 feet high.

On the second trip you follow a good trail to the head of Juniper Canyon, a great trough which comes into the mountains from the east. It is walled in on the south by the South Rim and on the north by the Chinese Wall. At the end of the Chinese Wall is magnificent Crown Peak. To reach it is hard and strenuous, but any tourist can easily take the short walk out to the head of Juniper Canyon and be rewarded by marvelous views.

You can see the Rio Grande 20 miles away and nearly a mile below you. Nearer is Elephant's Tusk, a sharp fang of a mountain rising from the plain. If you take the trail on up to the top of the Chinese Wall, you will see even more. Far below, on the left, is the deep ravine, Pine Canyon, and all around are great crags and pinnacles of colored rock, with fine stands of yellow pine not far away.

THIRD TRIP HELD FINEST IN MOUNTAINS

The third trip is considered the finest in the mountains. I made it on foot, but it is best to go by horseback. You climb the steep trail through the forest to the pass just west of Emory. You then go by an old lake bed, the Laguna, turn to the east, and pass under the south side of Mount Emory. Dropping off to the west is Blue Creek Canyon. You cross another pass on the east side of Emory, and then the trail slopes down a half mile through dense forest to Boot Creek.

All around are great forested mountains. To the north you look through the notch where Boot Creek drops into Juniper Canyon and see the Boot, a pinnacle probably 200 feet in height. Towering trees shade the trail here—pines, firs, and a splended mountain cypress.

The trail continues on to the south rim. Here you stand on the edge of a tremendous escarpment, 6,000 feet higher than the Rio Grande out there below you. A vertical cliff nearly a thousand feet high is below you, and below that the mountain drops away steeply. To the south you are looking down on the summits of high mountains, the southern Chisos.

You stand in a land of clouds and trees; far below is the desert wilderness. To the southwest stretch the great ranges of Mexico, Del Carmen, Fronterizas, and others beyond them. You stand in one world looking out upon another shimmering and opalescent and changing in the light, a vast panorama of mountain and plain. The national park people are accustomed to grand and spectacular scenery and are not easily made enthusiastic. So it means something when they state that they consider this as magnificent a view as can be found in the United States.

BIG BEND REGION IS RARE PARADISE

I have described three trips in the Chisos Mountains. Many others are possible. For the lover of the outdoors, of magnificent mountain scenery, of trees and plant life, of birds and wildlife, this region is a paradise. Here are found the rare Sonora or fantail deer, with the horns of a full-grown buck no larger than a man's outstretched hands. The blacktail deer is also found.

The park will be a large-scale museum for the botanist, with a range of plant life extending from the desert types at the bases of the mountains to Douglas fir, yellow pine, and accompanying vegetation on the upper levels. Geologically the region is one of the most interesting on the continent. The Chisos have been carved from a volcanic intrusion, while the Dead Horse, Santiago, and Del Carmen Ranges are limestone. Remains of many types of fossils have been found, among them the huge bones of dinosaurs.

But, the Chisos Mountains by no means exhaust the resources of the Big Bend. Equally remarkable are the magnificent canyons of the Rio Grande. The Santa Helena has been famous for many years. It is cut through a tremendous block of limestone, the Mesa de Anguila. It is 8 miles in length and some 1,500 feet in depth. The walls rise sheer from the river, but the canyon is by no means the dangerous and awful place which many people consider it.

I am very confident that it will be possible for tourists to make the trip up into the canyon with little difficulty and no danger. My wife and I camped for three nights in the canyon about 2½ miles from where the river emerges, and some time before, a party of us made the trip through the entire gorge. One part, it should be remembered, is difficult and dangerous and should be undertaken only by experienced and careful persons. Fortunately, most of the canyon is below this place, the labyrinth.

WORDS FAIL TO DESCRIBE GRANDEUR OF CANYON

Words are utterly inadequate to describe the magnificence and grandeur of this canyon. The traveler has one vista after another unfold before him. I will mention the cave, a huge oven-shaped cavern high on the canyon wall, 150 feet wide and equally high.

Fern Canyon is a spectacular side gorge from Mexico. Penguin Rock is a leaning stone splinter full 200 feet high. Most spectacular of all is the labyrinth, a wild inferno of great tumbled boulders with the water rushing through the narrow channels between them.

The Mariscal Canyon, about 50 miles downstream from Santa Helena, and at the very tip of the Big Bend, is in some respects as remarkable as the Santa Helena. It has marvelous rock sculpture, wonderfully varied scenery, and it can be traversed by boats, with no danger when the river is normal. A little farther down is the San Vicente Canyon, which would be famous were it not overshadowed by its great neighbors.

Beyond, the Rio Grande enters the third great canyon, the Boquillas, to leave the Big Bend region. These canyons will some day be recognized among the most magnificent and beautiful pieces of scenery in the United States. It will not be difficult for tourists to be conducted through them with an avoidance of all danger.

ENTIRE REGION IS ONE OF WONDER

I have spoken of these outstanding features of the Big Bend. The whole region is one of wonder and interest. The desert badlands, where the earth has been carved into weird and fantastic shapes with rich and beautiful coloring, will surpass the noted badlands of South Dakota and Nebraska. Along the Rio Grande are numerous hot springs, which have been famous for their healing properties. A little health resort is maintained at Hot Springs near Boquillas.

At Boquillas the river enters the great canyon bearing that name. Here the rough ridges of the Dead Horse Mountains reach the river. A little restaurant at Boquillas has long been famous for its Mexican dishes.

Across the Rio Grande and 12 miles distant is the huge wall of Del Carmen. The mountains rise in a huge escarpment 8,000 feet above the river. The summit is a smooth cliff, 200 feet high, with lines of cliff beneath it. Its level top is broken in one place by a rough canyon and the jutting crag of Shot Tower Peak.

To see this great wall at sunset on a clear winter evening is the event of a lifetime. The great cliffs glow with the richest and most gorgeous red imaginable. Between you and the Del Carmen is a range of considerable height, but it is dwarfed by the great wall 20 miles in length, and towering a mile and a half above you and flaming with the light of the dying sun.

CLIMATE IS MILD AND INVIGORATING

In our hurried and busy age there is needed a region such as this, rich in grand and varied scenery, mild and invigorating in climate, a place of healing and restoration for mind and body. It will be usable and attractive every month of the year. While Yellowstone and most of the other national parks are closed during a large part of the year, the Big Bend can be visited the year round. I know personally of one lady who has traveled all over the world. She always chooses the northern routes across the United States on account of the national parks.

A great number of others follow the same policy. For the people of the entire Nation and for our own great State and its citizenship, the establishment of the Big Bend National Park will be of inestimable value. It will be, I believe, the greatest single step ever taken in the history of the State of Texas.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House, recommended by the committee, calls for the appropriation of the stupendous sum of $785,999,094 for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. This staggering amount of money, if the same is appropriated by the Congress, will increase our indebtedness and will make necessary the imposition of other and additional taxes for the purpose of raising the funds with which to pay the principal and the interest in the discharge of our just obligations as a nation. I am constrained to say that the tax burden now imposed upon our people is one of the outstanding causes of our unemployment situation in this country. That is our No. 1 problem today.

Mr. Chairman, many of our people are deeply concerned respecting the grave situation which confronts us. The records show that we have from 9,000,000 to 12,000,000 unemployed people in our land. The administration in power is doing little about it. Our first task is to rejuvenate and reestablish business and industry to the point that our unemployed are absorbed thereby; our people want to work at permanent and substantial jobs at which they may earn substantial wages; they want to live in a manner fitting their station in life. The attack made on the unemployed situation has constituted temporary relief only. For 7 years this temporary relief has been extended—and I do not condemn the expenditure of money for the unemployed and the needy of our country where needed, because our first duty is to care for the people of the United States of America—but the policy has been pursued of spending vast sums of money for many other things which are not of importance, and certainly not as essential as the care of our own people who are unemployed and who are needy and those who have reached the age at which they are unable to obtain employment in private industry.

While this temporary relief has continued for the 7 years just passed, little has been done which would lend aid in the permanent solution of this great and important problem in our country. It is certainly a very sad commentary to behold that our country, with its vast resources and unlimited opportunity, has confessedly failed in solving the greatest problem before it; and, in fact, it has done so little about that outstanding problem that a permanent solution is now as far removed as it was at the very outset.

Mr. Chairman, our people have grown impatient because vast sums of money have been appropriated and the money has been spent for useless and needless things in our country. The huge increases of the personnel in the various departments of government, which have added many millions of dollars of expense to the taxpayers of our country, has caused uneasiness on the part of our people, because they know they must pay the added cost in the taxes imposed. The President assured the Congress and the people that the reorganization bill, which he forced through both the House and the Senate, would permit him to reduce the personnel in the departments of government and thereby reduce the cost and expense of government, but this was not accomplished; the last report reveals that the President, in carrying out his plan of reorganization, instead of decreasing the employees and the cost, has added approximately 100,000 men and women to the pay rolls in Washington, and that the cost and expense in those very departments have increased many millions of dollars annually. We may look at the appropriations in the War and Navy Departments, which have reached into the billions of dollars, and while we are in full accord that we must be adequately prepared and that we must have an adequate national defense, yet when huge sums are appropriated for some one specific purpose and a vast sum is available for that particular project, we know of the great waste of money that follows.

The War Department and the Navy Department are preparing at this very moment as if for war, and are using the vast sums which were appropriated for those Departments in the frenzy of the impulse "to spend it all as quickly as possible." We are not in war. We are not going to become involved in this European war. We must keep out of this war. We must defend the physical well-being of our men and boys of the United States of America. That will be done.

I might mention many other items of great expense which have been incurred, but the record is filled, from cover to cover, with them—useless and needless expenses—and these have been continued by the administration now in power until practically 25 cents out of every dollar is absorbed in the payment of the taxes which have been imposed upon the people. When we speak of taxes we are quite often inclined to associate the payment of taxes with those which are open and apparent, such as the payment of the taxes upon real estate or personal property, upon the tangible property which we have and which taxes are spread upon the tax duplicates in our respective counties. But we must remember these are not all of the taxes which are imposed upon us. We have hidden taxes on practically every essential commodity we use. The clothing we wear, the food we eat, and the things essential for our daily use bear the imprint of taxes. These taxes, which are a very great burden upon our people, fall with the same weight upon the rich and the poor, the employed and the unemployed, the W. P. A. worker and the president of a bank; no one escapes the tax which is paid when we buy bread and food, clothing, and the absolute necessities of life; these hidden taxes are included in the cost price to the consumer—and the consumer pays the tax regardless of his or her financial or other condition in life. That we may keep the record straight, and that the people may know the facts, the spending of the huge sums of money for nonessential things, by the administration now in power, is the sole cause of the necessity for the imposition of the high and staggering taxes upon the rich and the poor alike in our country, and these very taxes which are now imposed, and which are hidden in the cost price of every essential commodity used by our people, have been the sole cause of our high cost of living in this country. The solution of the high cost of living in our country is to curtail the spending of money for nonessential things in this Nation. The farmer, the laborer, the businessman, and the industrialist face the same ponderous problem of "How can I pay the taxes?" We know that when our surplus funds are absorbed in the payment of taxes, we have nothing left with which to pay for those things which we might desire—the new automobile, furniture, the painting of the house, or the repair of the fences—therefore, those men who otherwise would be able to obtain work are left without a job; this condition is the direct result of the spending of money for nonessential things and the imposition of high taxes upon the people for the purpose of raising the money with which to meet the debt created by the spending.

The huge naval appropriations bill, and the vast sum requested for the War Department, the large increase of the cost in the various departments of Government, and the increase in the number of the personnel employed in Washington caused by the centralization of the power in the Nation's Capital have all made their contribution to the vast increase in the taxes imposed upon the people. This spending must be stopped in order that our taxes may be reduced all to the end that our surplus funds may be made available to employ the unemployed, and that we may aid in taking up the slack which exists in the labor situation in our country. Men want work in our Nation at a fair and a reasonable wage—not at a W. P. A. wage which merely provides an existence—which will enable them to live in accordance with the American standard. Many of our people desire to employ labor at this very moment, but are prevented from doing so by our own Government imposing taxes which take away that opportunity. The spending of the vast and incomprehensible sums of money by our Government has aided temporarily only, and that very act is now causing disaster in our country, and is creating consternation among all of our people. The sole solution is to materially curtail the spending, thereby reducing the taxes, and give the people a chance. This policy will aid every class of our people and will materially assist in the restoration of common-sense government in our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, coming back to the subject matter of this bill, I want to bring to the attention of the members of the subcommittee, particularly, some considerations which it seems to me have to do with the interests of the National Guard of the several States. I know from my talks with the commanding general of the New York National Guard and other senior officers of the New York National Guard that they are particularly interested in the proposed maneuvers affecting the First Army, of which they would be a part, and its effect on the training of our National Guard troops. I take it the National Guard in other States are similarly interested. These are outlined on page 12 of the report on this bill under the heading "Field exercises." The current appropriation is $15,382,650. The Budget estimate for the coming fiscal year is $6,279,060, and the amount proposed by the committee is $5,831,306. This provides for field training in the present fiscal year being conducted upon a scale never before seriously contemplated. The program was presented to the House last January in connection with the Emergency Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1940. The principal projects embraced by the instant estimate are independent maneuvers by the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Armies. The First Army will maneuver in the Watertown-Plattsburg, N. Y., area, in which it is planned to have 123,772 Regular Army and National Guard troops and Reserve officers participate. Broken down, this represents 36,000 Regular Army troops and 87,000 National Guard troops. It also provides for 21 days' training instead of the usual 2 weeks' period.

I want to say to the members of the committee that the present commanding officer of the New York National Guard, Maj. Gen. William N. Haskell, a graduate of West Point, had probably 20 years' service with the Regular Army, not only in France but as commander of the American forces in Russia and for the past 12 or 15 years he has been the commanding officer of the New York National Guard. He has, therefore, both the point of view of the Regular Army and of the National Guard.

In New York we have approximately 22,000 troops in the National Guard, or the equivalent of two or a little more of the present new streamlined Regular Army divisions at peace strength, and there is no better trained National Guard in the country. The matter of enlistment and maintenance in strength of the National Guard divisions in New York, as you will realize, certainly those of you who have ever served in a National Guard, is a serious matter. The enlistment period is 3 years, and I believe it is a similar period throughout the country. This means that on the average we have coming into the National Guard of New York somewhere under 7,000 men a year as new recruits. During the past 6 months there have been in New York State beyond that number under the extraordinary program of this winter several thousand additional new recruits, with the result, you might say, that we have 10,000 to 12,000 comparatively new men in the New York Guard, which is equal to two Regular streamlined Army divisions.

Last year the New York National Guard participated in maneuvers at Plattsburg, with some 40,000 or 50,000 troops of the Regular Army and National Guard from surrounding States. Those men who participated in the maneuvers last year did not receive the usual basic training so requisite to the establishment of National Guard morale. Those who took part in that maneuver did not receive any of the basic camp training, so that a large proportion of the New York National Guard and the Guard of surrounding States who took part in that maneuver missed the basic training so essential to the new recruits and will miss it this year by having another First Army maneuvers such as is scheduled here on such an elaborate scale. It means that the New York troops and the troops of the surrounding States who took part in the maneuvers last year will also miss their basic training this year. The Regular Army enjoy this, and it is a benefit to them, but remember that the enlisted personnel in the Regular Army who take part in these maneuvers have received their basic training during the 8- or 10-month period before the maneuvers. Insofar as I can see, the maneuvers are largely for the benefit of the General Staff officers. The National Guard officers of New York State are having the benefit of special training this winter in the various camps in the South.

The position of the commanding officer of the New York National Guard and, in fact, of all the officers of the New York National Guard, is that these maneuvers insofar as the larger States are concerned, New England generally, and the eastern area, should be staggered, and should be held at least not oftener than every other year, or once in every 3 years.

Let me point out to you also that the maneuvers have been extended to 21 days. Anyone who has served in the National Guard will realize that this means a great deal, and it risks the loss of some of the most valuable young officers in the National Guard, for these are the men who hold responsible posts with industrial concerns, are attorneys in law firms, or are connected in some supervisory capacity in business. It is almost impossible for these men to consider a training period beyond 2 weeks; hence they will be forced to resign. The only ones who can afford to take 3 weeks are usually city officials, county officials, members of fire departments, and people having such employment that they can get extended time. I have no doubt that if the General Staff persists in carrying on these maneuvers extending the period to 21 days, that it will seriously undermine the morale and discipline of the New York division, and I think this will also be true of National Guard divisions from the other States whose men participated in the maneuvers last year and who will participate in them again this year.

I believe these maneuvers should be staggered; that they should not follow in successive years involving the same National Guard troops; and I would like to ask some member of the committee if I am correct in understanding that under field exercises on pages 9 and 10 of the bill, the amount $5,831,306 represents the total appropriations for these maneuvers by the five field armies. May I ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if that is correct?

Mr. TERRY. That is correct.

Mr. ANDREWS. On page 121 of the hearings, Special Field Exercises Projects, in a footnote under project 3, referring to 17–A maneuvers, First Army, $250,000 in this connection is set up for maneuvers for the First Army. This is in the estimate at the end of the table of the report, $250,000 for each army so far as maneuvers are concerned having to do with concentration.

Mr. TERRY. Approximately that.

Mr. ANDREWS. It is on page 121 of the hearings, Special Field Exercises for the Army. It says, under 17–A, maneuvers, First Army, $1,456,948, and in footnote $250,000 each for the First, Third, and Fourth Army, caring for the concentration of National Guard troops.

Mr. TERRY. Approximately about a million dollars, as I understand it. The actual amount for the First Army is $1,456,948.

Mr. ANDREWS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TERRY. That is the amount in the bill.

Mr. THOMASON. Are we to understand, then, that the program is to be staggered?

Mr. ANDREWS. I do not know what the program is to be for the future, but I understand that hereafter it will be staggered. I know we had maneuvers last year in New York, and under the present program we are obliged to have them again this year. I do not want to be misunderstood as saying that either I personally or as a Representative from New York oppose maneuvers. We all realize the importance of maneuvers, but, generally speaking, the National Guard officials of the State of New York believe that, rather than have these maneuvers 2 years in succession, they should be abandoned this year in New York, and they should be staggered from now on in order to continue to maintain the basic training morale and excellence of the National Guard in New York.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. It seems to me we had testimony somewhere recently that the purpose of holding all of the maneuvers this year, which are included in this bill, is to bring the Regular troops together with the National Guard troops when the Regular troops are fresh from the lessons they have had in the long period of training during this winter, which will probably not be possible again after this year; then the maneuvers will be staggered in the different Army areas in succeeding years, and there will not be maneuvers 2 years in succession.

Mr. ANDREWS. Regular Army troops took part in the maneuvers last year with the National Guard in New York. When the Guard units, containing so many new recruits, participate, all they do in these maneuvers is march around day after day under the general orders of some staff officer. They get no basic training whatsoever and lose their time for this important field training during that year.

Mr. THOMASON. Is it contemplated then that those who have been on maneuvers in the South during the winter are to go on maneuvers again this summer and fall?

Mr. ANDREWS. As I understand it, they will be moved and swung into these four new maneuvers again in various sections of the country.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. I agree with the gentleman and his statement in reference to maneuvers and staggering them. It certainly is of prime importance for any man in the National Guard, or any man in the Regular service, or any man in any military service to receive basic training, because if he does not receive basic training you will never have a soldier. The idea that some people have, that you can make soldiers by taking men and marching them around in a field, is erroneous. If they rob the men in the National Guard of their basic training they have robbed them of their most valuable asset that an army can have and, also, when they require the officers in the National Guard, as the gentleman has already explained, to attend 3 weeks instead of 2, they are taking more time away from their business and from their employers than they can well afford.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is particularly true where units come from large urban areas.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I understand General Marshall made the statement that a part of the 21 days would be given over to basic training. That is, there would be several days devoted to basic training.

Mr. ANDREWS. That may be true. The trouble is that the resignations of some of the best men from the New York National Guard will be increased from now until next summer and we will lose a lot of the men we ought to have because they cannot take the 21 days in justice to their civil and business pursuits. It is always the most valuable men who cannot take the extra time.

Mr. TERRY. They are not going to have maneuvers every year. I understand that in 1942 they will start to rotate every year.

Mr. ANDREWS. We would like to start that rotation now, because we had maneuvers last year.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The testimony of General Andrews was that it is planned to have no Army maneuvers for the year 1942 and return to the staggered system in 1943.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, the people of this country approved the enactment by this Congress of the Hatch Act to prevent pernicious political activities on the part of Federal employees, and welcome the inclusion under the safeguards of the act of State employees paid, in part, with Federal funds.

No longer will those who hold Government positions be required, by political machines, to contribute a part of their wages or devote time and energy to help political parties in elections. They will have the privilege of voting as they please and contributing what they please.

The Hatch Act, and the Senate-approved amendments, divorce politics from State and Federal service, purify politics by preventing any person from promising benefits under any act of Congress to anyone as a reward for political activities, guarantee complete freedom of the balblot, clear the way for extension of the civil service, prevent intimidation or coercion of voters, place the business of the Government on a nonpolitical basis, and prohibit the use of the people's money to secure an office.

States' rights are not invaded; they are protected against the use of Federal slush funds and alliances of Federal and State machines to control elections. Federal funds appropriated by the Congress and given to States for road-building and other purposes will not be used to pay appointees of a State machine for political work under the direction of a political boss. This means more efficient service and better government.

Provisions limiting to $5,000 the contribution by any person during any calendar year or for use in any one campaign or election, and prohibiting contributions by contractors or individuals furnishing supplies or performing services for any agency of the Government during the period of negotiations or performance of such services are important steps toward the prevention of corruption.

The enforcement of the measure by the Civil Service Commission, an agency having many years of experience in dealing with the subject, provides assurance that the intent of the Congress will be carried out.

The Hatch Act as amended is the answer to intimidation, coercion, dishonesty, and corruption in State and National elections. It will not interfere with the personal liberty of State and Federal employees, but it will interfere with attempts at sordid debauchery of the ballot and pernicious political activities of Government employees on Government time and at Government expense.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND].

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, on page 14 of the report on this bill we find the following item:

Alaska air base. Budget estimate, $12,734,060. Committee proposal, blank. Reduction, $12,734,060.

It is evident that the proposed Alaska air base is out of the bill. This may be called economy by annihilation.

On page 15 of the report two paragraphs are devoted to the proposed air base, giving the reasons for its elimination from the bill. I shall read only the last of these paragraphs. I quote:

The committee does not take the position that an air base for military operations is not needed in Alaska. That area unquestionably is of great strategic importance to the defense of continental United States, but it is unwilling to be rushed into a course which it feels has not been thoroughly studied. A considerably lesser amount has been informally suggested to the committee to get the project under way or established on a more modest scale. It is felt, however, that the entire question should be thoroughly canvassed or recanvassed by the General Staff before any commitment is made. In the interim the naval air station being built on Kodiak Island, some 200 miles to the south and west of Anchorage, probably will have been completed and we shall not be wholly without aviation protection in that far northwestern area.

So far I have quoted from the committee report, Mr. Chairman. I think it is a great pity, and it may be a tragedy, that the committee has not provided at least enough money to start work on the Anchorage air base, as is proposed by the General Staff of the Army and by the War Department, and has, of course, the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and of the President.

Many articles appear nowadays in newspapers and magazines, written by strategists of various types and abilities, concerning the importance of what is called the Pacific triangle, the lower end of which is anchored at the Panama Canal, the central part at the Hawaiian Islands, and the northern end in Alaska. Not only amateur strategists, but men who have given their lives to the study of military science, believe that that is an all-important defense line, and that if it is not maintained the country may be endangered. Of all the points on that line between Panama and Alaska, with the possible exception of the Panama Canal itself, I suggest to the House that Alaska is far and away the most important because it lies on a direct line and therefore on a short line—what is called the great circle route between the main body of the United States and the Orient. The control of this short line is the more important because we have lately found out that not only are the Japanese putting in naval and military installations in the mandated islands and in the northern part of the Japanese Archipelago—which, by the way, lies within 700 miles of Attu Island, a part of the United States, and the most western of the Aleutians—but that Soviet Russia has recently installed substantial military and naval works on the Komandorskie Islands, or the Bering Islands, which lie within 260 miles of the Aleutians.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. I wonder if the gentleman would care to remark on whether the people of Alaska, as no doubt they have, have paid attention to the fight of the Finns and their defense against the Russians, and to the important part in furnishing supplies and transportation to the Finns the reindeer have played in that fight. No doubt the people of Alaska have noticed that.

Mr. DIMOND. Unquestionably.

Mr. FADDIS. I wonder if the gentleman would care to remark about the importance of retaining the reindeer herd in Alaska and keeping it there for eventual use in time of war if ever Alaska should be invaded.

Mr. DIMOND. Fortunately, it seems probable that the reindeer herds will be preserved under legislation passed by this Congress and an appropriation made last summer. Before that legislation was enacted and an appropriation made, I just about despaired of keeping any substantial number of reindeer in Alaska. They would be of great value, to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], not only for transportation purposes, although in fact in Alaska the airplane has largely supplanted all other forms of transportation, but because they would be of outstanding utility as a source of food. There is no reason why Alaska cannot maintain 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 reindeer, more than are found in all northern Siberia and northern Europe. In time of need the possession of that amount of food as well as the other articles that can be derived from reindeer would be of immense value.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] has indicated, the reindeer is of high utility as a draft animal. But in order to be thus useful it is necessary that they be domesticated and trained. A well-fed and well-trained reindeer will travel almost incredible distances without food or with little food. Instances are recorded of reindeer which covered more than 100 miles in 24 hours pulling a sled and load of approximately 200 pounds. I can conceive of circumstances when, under war conditions as in Finland recently, the reindeer which are well trained might be of inestimable military use as draft animals. But at the same time it must be said that in Alaska the airplane has already practically eliminated dog teams as a means of conveyance, and if planes were available. there would be little occasion for the use of reindeer as a means of transportation.

As a source of food the reindeer is of much more consequence. The flesh is savory and tender and nourishing. It can be used in any one of a dozen different forms; dried and treated in a suitable manner it makes excellent pemmican and is highly sustaining. If Alaska should be cut off from the United States by loss of control of the Pacific, the reindeer would be almost literally worth their weight in gold as a source of food for the residents of Alaska and for the military forces which may be stationed in the Territory. The building up of the reindeer herds is quite in harmony with the plans for national defense, and I am thankful to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Colonel FADDIS, who has had such extensive military service, for inviting my attention to this highly important subject.

Now, let us go back to the Anchorage air base. Nobody can possibly have any greater respect for the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, which has jurisdiction of this bill, than I entertain. No one can possibly have any greater deference to their judgment. But candor and the requirements of national defense—the safety of the citizens of the United States, whether they reside in the States or Alaska—compels me to say that I believe the action of the committee in rejecting this item is a mistake, a mistake that ought to be remedied before the bill passes the House. In its report the committee suggests that the project has not been thoroughly studied. It is further suggested that perhaps the General Staff of the Army has based its recommendation for construction of the base upon insufficient information.

After reading those parts of the printed record of the hearings which had to do with this matter, I am compelled to the opposite conclusion. It seems to me that the hearings themselves disclosed a thorough study of all phases of the subject and a firm and confident recommendation by the General Staff for the adoption of the project and for the appropriation therefor of $12,734,060 as set up in the Budget estimate. Surely there is nothing uncertain or indefinite in the testimony of General Marshall, Chief of Staff, as it is set forth in the printed record of the hearings on pages 23 and 24 as follows:

The establishment of an operating air base in Alaska is a project of major importance.

The appropriation for the current year of $4,000,000 for air installations at Fairbanks was based upon providing facilities for a composite squadron to be stationed there for cold weather experimental purposes. The question as to the proper location of the main operating base had not been definitely determined at that time, although previous studies had indicated that Fairbanks might be a suitable location for this base.

During the past summer a board of officers was sent to Alaska to make a complete survey of possible airfields in order to determine the proper location for an operating base. As a result of its survey the board recommended that it should be located at Anchorage. The recommendation was based, not only upon strategic considerations and joint war plans with the Navy, but also upon climatic conditions, which indicate that an air force can operate against the most probable hostile threats from a base located between the mountains and the sea during a much greater portion of the time than it could from a base inland from the mountains, such as Fairbanks. The recommendations of the board have been approved.

The station at Fairbanks is required in addition to the main operating base at Anchorage because the weather at Anchorage is not cold enough to permit training in the extremely low temperatures characteristic of a considerable part of the Territory.

The conception of an air base is not that of a single installation or station. In an operating sense, such a base is composed of a main operating base—in this case, Anchorage—and a number of auxiliary airdromes, stations, or landing fields. The cold weather experimental station will be one of these auxiliary stations.

It is considered essential that a composite group be stationed in Alaska in time of peace in order to be available for immediate use in defense of our naval establishments there and to prevent seizure by an enemy of undefended sites for use as bases for air and naval operations in the northern Pacific.

Provision for the necessary housing and other facilities for this composite group will require the sum of $12,734,060; for the acquisition of land, $85,000.

In addition to the composite group, it is planned eventually to station at Anchorage ground troops available for immediate use, jointly with naval and air forces, to defend our naval and air establishments in Alaska against possible hostile attack.

It is not necessary for me to say to you that General Marshall is a capable and experienced soldier. Anyone who has heard him testify, as I have, before the Military Affairs Committee of the House upon the problems of national defense could not possibly escape the conviction that he has studied and understands those problems as comparatively few other men have studied and understand them. So when he says in his testimony before the Appropriation Subcommittee (page 23 of the hearings) that "the establishment of an operating air base in Alaska is a subject of major importance" we owe to this expression of his opinion the respect which is due to the statement of an expert speaking upon a subject to which he has given a lifetime of concentrated study and as to which he possesses knowledge as nearly complete as is given to a human being to enjoy. In face of this statement, I suggest that the recommendation of the committee "that the entire question should be thoroughly canvassed or recanvassed by the General Staff" is not solidly based.

May I invite the Members of the House to read also the testimony of General Arnold, Chief of the Air Corps, concerning this subject. With admirable succinctness General Arnold—page 340—stated the mission of the Army air force in Alaska. It is as follows:

The mission of the air force would be, first, to provide for the defense of the coast line, or anything approaching the coast line; and, second, being in a position where they could be called upon by the Navy to go out and reinforce the Navy in any action they might have in the North Pacific. In the third place, it will provide a connecting link between the Army and the Navy in the area between the United States and Hawaii and Alaska.

General Arnold, too, insists upon the need of the Alaska air base at Anchorage. His testimony is not tentative nor hesitant nor does it show any lack of the most comprehensive and intelligent knowledge of the subject. We all know that General Arnold is an outstanding air officer, fully alive to the revolution in military strategy and military power resulting from the discovery and development of the airplane. While we have many, many other capable officers in the Air Corps, I have yet to find a single person who does not believe that General Arnold is the right man for his present job, Chief of the Air Corps. His considered judgment on any matter falling within the scope of his official duties is deserving of the most careful thought.

The fact that the Anchorage air base was not recommended last year can scarcely be of any great consequence. Many things have happened since the War Department appropriation bill for 1940 was before the Appropriations Committee and before Congress. Since that time we have been confronted almost literally with the world in arms and a world at war. The European and Asiatic nations not yet in the war are in almost momentary danger of being engaged. Unless peace comes quickly, the terrible probability is that the Balkan countries and Russia and Japan will be in the war within another 6 months. We all know that one somewhat private war between Russia and Finland has just been ended and that Finland, one of the bravest and most admirable and most civilized nations of the earth, as well as one of the freest, has been left shorn of territory and gasping for its very existence. What did not seem more than remotely possible a year ago is now the horrible actuality.

In his testimony General Arnold referred briefly to the changed conditions which now exist as compared with those which existed a year ago and the need for taking cognizance of those changed conditions. How stupid it would be for our military experts to say that because a plan was suitable or a force was good enough last year or the year before that it ought to be followed without any change or alteration today. Such an attitude would be comparable in supernal wisdom to the thought processes of the ostrich, which buries its head in the sand. Every word of the testimony, as shown in the hearings, is convincing of the really profound thought and study which have been given to the national problem in Alaska by the General Staff.

After all, we are living in 1940 and not in 1920 or 1900. Defense measures that were adequate 20, or 30, or 40 years ago are pitifully worthless at the present time. Just a few days since, the newspapers carried a story of an Army airplane now in production that will easily be able to fly to Europe and return. Still more recently we learned of the building of a Navy plane to have a radius sufficient for travel nonstop from the United States to Japan and back. These reports may be extravagant, but it is certain that the development of the airplane has made the Atlantic Ocean for defense purposes not much wider than the Hudson River at the time of the Revolutionary War. With the airplane, even as it now exists, and certainly as it is likely to be developed within the next 10 years—perhaps within the next 2 years—we can no longer rely for our safety upon the isolation which was once afforded us by the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, for with airplanes in existence, those oceans have shrunk until they are, for defense, little more than glorified ditches.

This is a case where, under existing world conditions, delay is dangerous. Of course, the war may be over tomorrow, or next week, or next year. The forces of evil may be routed. But we have no assurance upon that point. It seems now much more likely that the war will expand and that, unless we are so strong as to be considered impregnable, we, too, will have to fight for our very lives and for the maintenance of that freedom which is so much more valuable than life to all true Americans. If the war should come to us, there will then be no time to prepare for it; there will then be no time to build an air base or to make any provision for national defense. In order to be reasonably safe, and in order to give ourselves the best possible insurance against being involved in the war, we must have our defensive forces ready. Weakness will inevitably invite attack.

Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking for the people of Alaska alone. It is not only Alaska that is endangered by an absence of adequate defensive installations in the Territory. People who live in the States are equally in peril. An enemy in possession of Alaska is within easy striking distance of the States and such possession by a hostile force would outflank our great defense base at Pearl Harbor.

One of the principal reasons why it is in a public interest to take action at this time for the building of the Anchorage air base is to permit the organization and operation of a National Guard air unit in Alaska. On this point, as well as on other features of the subject, I made a somewhat extended statement before the subcommittee and from that statement I quote the following:

Some people seem to think that as long as we control the Hawaiian Islands we control the entire Pacific, but that is erroneous unless we have a superior fleet in the Pacific. If our fleet should be in the Atlantic and the Panama Canal blocked, then the fortifications in Alaska would be indispensable for the safety of the United States, because although some might be willing to surrender the few people in Alaska to the enemy, we must remember that any foreign power in Alaska is within striking distance of the United States, almost as close to the United States as the Germans are to Scapa Flow. So, if the United States is to be really safe we ought to have an air base in Alaska.

It has been frequently said that the Hawaiian Islands are in a strategical sense, the key to the Pacific. But that statement contains only half a truth. The possession of the Hawaiian Islands, coupled with the present strong defensive works in those islands, are of immense value for the safety of the United States. The possession of the Hawaiian group by an enemy would be a threat to our safety, but not so much of a threat as would the possession of Alaska by a hostile power. An enemy at Honolulu would still be some 2,400 miles from the United States. An enemy in possession of Alaska would be less than 750 miles from the United States.

Let us change the figure of speech and say that from a military viewpoint the Hawaiian Islands are a door to the main body of the United States, a door that is now barred and bolted by the strong defensive installations at Pearl Harbor. But the other door to the United States, which lies on the short direct route between the potential enemy and the United States is Alaska, and that door is at the present moment wide open. From the most ancient times it has been considered the reverse of wisdom to lock one door of a house and leave another, equally accessible, not only unlocked but invitingly open to all marauders. If there is any strategic validity in the oft-repeated principle that he who holds and works on the short interior lines has an advantage over his opponents, a validity that has not only been admitted but asserted by military captains from Alexander the Great to the late, able Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest, then it is indisputable that a force in possession of Alaska is in comparably superior position to one which is based at Honolulu.

Our well-known defense triangle in the Pacific is anchored at the Panama Canal at one end and Alaska at the other, with Hawaii in the middle. Each of the three points must have adequate defensive works if the triangle can be maintained. To fortify Hawaii alone is not sufficient. The present installations at Hawaii are remarkably powerful and our defensive works at Panama are rapidly becoming so. We have at last discovered the weakness of leaving Panama with insufficient defensive works and forces. But up to the present moment little has been done in Alaska and, therefore, the triangle is vulnerable and dangerously vulnerable at that point. The establishment in Alaska of defensive works, particularly the facilities for the use of air power, reasonably comparable to those which now exist at Hawaii and which will soon be in existence at Panama, are necessary to adequately protect not only Alaska but the main body of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, one of the principal reasons for asking the establishment of any Army air base at Anchorage is to have the facilities there for a proposed National Guard air unit. It is planned to establish such a unit at Anchorage if the necessary facilities can be obtained. I am authorized to say that the setting up of such a National Guard unit will not only be welcomed by the General Staff of the Army, but that General Marshall, the Chief of Staff, has expressed his unqualified approval of it. But without the facilities of an Army air base at Anchorage, a National Guard air unit is out of the question because the Territory is not able to supply those facilities.

It is highly important that the residents of Alaska themselves participate in the plans for the defensive works of the Nation in the Territory. They are not only willing but eager to do that, but they must have the aid of such facilities as will be found in an Army air base. So far as I am personally concerned, I have not even thought of suggesting any other forces for Anchorage than air forces and possibly the necessary antiaircraft guns, and they would not be numerous. The important thing is to have a Regular Army air base, the base also of a National Guard unit capable of accommodating a substantial air force, and thus together be able to offer a smashing defense against any potential enemy that may try to use Alaska as a stepping stone from the Orient to the United States, and to defend as well our valuable northern Territory with its great wealth in fisheries, minerals, forests, and farm lands.

Without being alarmists, it becomes us all to take heed of the present state of the world and future prospects. It must be evident to all that the independent, liberty-loving nations of the earth are faced with a coalition of mighty, totalitarian states, the masters of which are determined, if they can, to rule the earth. More than ever at this time is adequate national defense—adequate in every respect—the best insurance against attack and the best insurance against becoming involved in any war. In recent months our eyes have been fixed so firmly on the nations fighting on the other side of the Atlantic—or, if not fighting, likely to become involved in the war at any moment—that we have almost forgotten the threat to our peace which exists on the other side of the Pacific. We have all too long assumed that if Japan were hostile to us Soviet Russia would be friendly, or vice versa. More and more the development in the struggle for world power has indicated that all of the totalitarian nations will probably eventually, and soon, form a solid block against all the rest of the world. We are confronted with not only the possibility but the probability of an outright alliance between Soviet Russia and Japan. In such an event could there be any doubt of not only the advisability but the instant need of having adequate defensive works in Alaska?

In the New York Times of March 19, 1940, appears an article by the famous newspaper correspondent, Hallett Abend, who has spent many years in the Orient, in which he calls attention to the fortification by Soviet Russia of the North Pacific zone. From that article I quote the following:

"British, French, and Japanese naval men in the Far East are keeping worried eyes focused upon Kamchatka and the Komandorskie (Commodore) Islands, and, as tension mounts between Washington and Tokyo, American naval men in the Orient are also puzzling over what may actually be going on in this remote and little-known portion of the North Pacific zone.

"Only a few facts are known for a certainty, and these are disturbing. First, Soviet Russia is fortifying the two main islands of the Komandorskie group—Bering Island and Medny Island. Moreover, a small submarine base already exists on Bering Island, and the British and French fear that Russia may grant Germany the use of this base for raids in the Pacific if the Allies should become embroiled with Russia.

"In December of last year a large group of German naval officers arrived at Nikolaevsk-Amur, flew to the Komandorskie Islands in Russian naval planes, and remained there until late in January of this year.

"Russians who have reached Shanghai from Vladivostok confirm this report, and offer further evidence in the form of recent issues of Vladivostok newspapers, which say that 'the party of German officers were the guests of Commander Yumasheff, commander of the Soviet Pacific Fleet.'

"Almost 20 German submarine commanders, also the guests of Commander Yumasheff, visited the Komandorskie Islands in January, and in groups of 10 or 12. Diesel engine experts and German submarine experts gathered at Vladivostok and were flown to the Komandorskie group. Some came from Germany via the trans-Siberian Railway, but others arrived from the United States, from Mexico, and South America, and not a few went northward from China, the Philippines, and other parts of the Far East."

In this connection let me invite the attention of the committee to the fact that the Komandorskie Islands belonging to Soviet Russia, which are mentioned in Mr. Abend's dispatch, are situated approximately 260 miles northwesterly from Attu Island in the Aleutians. In other words, Komandorskie Islands are just about 260 miles distant from land which is a part of the United States. Yet it appears that those islands are now being fortified, in fact, have been fortified, and that a submarine base already exists on one of them. The fact that these fortifications exist within approximately 260 miles of our territory, considered in connection with the fact that the Japanese naval base at Paramushiru in the Japanese Archipelago lies within 750 miles of territory of the United States, ought to be sufficient warning that defensive works in Alaska are now necessary and that the construction of those works should be no longer delayed. Under modern conditions it is difficult if not impossible for any nation to arm adequately after war starts, particularly with respect to defensive installations which require some considerable time to build. Moreover, if such works are to be really a power for peace they must be in existence before the fatal moment when war is declared or commenced.

The proposed air base for Anchorage will cost comparatively little, but its construction will afford a nucleus for such air forces as may be set up in Alaska under the National Guard; it will be of immense defensive use in the event of war; and by defending a Territory now almost entirely undefended it will make its contribution as an insurer of peace.

In view of the troubled condition of the world and the fact that we may be confronted at an early date by a combination of hostile powers on the other side of the Pacific, I suggest—I insistently urge—that although there is no amount for the Alaska air base carried in the bill at the present time, the committee should reconsider the subject and at least provide whatever can be spent economically and wisely during the coming year, if not the whole amount of $12,734,060, which is set up by the Bureau of the Budget. Let us act now. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a book entitled "We Accuse," which I commend to the serious study of all Members of this House. This document, as indicated in its introduction, is "dedicated to those American seamen who are Americans in thought as well as in deed and is intended as a warning of the dangers that lie ahead." This book was written by bona fide seamen who are opposed to the Communist Party control of the National Maritime Union of the C. I. O.

Throughout the 192 pages of this volume is factual information, taken from actual records, which demonstrates beyond a reasonable doubt that the National Maritime Union of America, headed by Joseph Curran, president, is under the absolute control of the Communist Party. Real American seamen, like the authors of this volume, have protested in vain against the tactics of the disciples of Stalin, who have, by trickery, deceit, sabotage, and smear campaigns, finally assumed complete and absolute control of this marine union.

The wily Communist, following the dictates of Moscow, long ago realized that the American merchant marine was one of the strategic industries of the world and years ago embarked upon a plan to seize control of and to dictate and dominate this great industry. Real Americans among the rank and file of seamen, knowing the aims and purposes of the Communist group, have fought valiantly against the disciples of Stalin in their effort to capture the seamen and their unions. These loyal Americans, including the authors of this volume, have been driven from their union by the Communist control, and when they have attempted to fight back and present the truth and facts they have become the victims, as is always the case, of a smear campaign conducted through the medium of the Communist Daily Worker, the Communist-inspired Pilot, and other Communist papers.

I desire to applaud the efforts of these loyal American citizens who will continue to resist the efforts of Stalin and his gang to take over absolute control of our fleet, and I trust that every Member of this House may take the time to read this volume, We Accuse, because the facts therein set forth constitute an indictment against the present leadership of the National Maritime Union that will admit of no answer except "guilty as charged."

The communistic control of the merchant marine strikes at the vitals of our national defense. For example, the War Department, under the administration of Secretary of War Woodring, controls and operates the Panama Railroad Co. for the Federal Government. This company operates three large new passenger and cargo ships between the port of New York and the Canal Zone, namely, the Ancon, the Panama, and the Cristobal. The primary purpose of these ships is to act as carriers of essential supplies from this country to the Canal Zone for national-defense purposes. These ships are manned by merchant seamen. The War Department, through the Panama Railroad Co., hires seamen only through the "hiring hall" of the National Maritime Union of the C. I. O., although it has no contract or closed-shop agreement with the unions. Naturally there would be no contract in this case for the same reason that there is no contract signed between the Federal Government and any of its employees here in Washington. However, when a vacancy occurs among the unlicensed personnel on any of these three ships while in the port of New York, the port officials of the line instruct their office force to call upon the National Maritime Union to obtain the necessary replacement. As the port of New York is the only place where any hiring of seamen takes place for this line, it is apparent that the National Maritime Union gets the exclusive privilege of supplying seamen for these ships.

What type of seamen are supplied by this union to the Panama Railroad Co. operated by the United States Government? In order to present this picture clearly, it will be necessary at this point to indicate another phase of the Communist Party's water-front policy. During the years 1937 and 1939 the Communist Party, through its water-front section, conducted secret training schools for seamen. Only good party members were eligible to train in these schools and the ultimate aim was to place the graduates of the school as keymen on all our more important merchant ships. With their background of Communist Party training, these keymen were expected to control the labor policies of the crews upon the ships on which they had been placed and they could also be used as couriers for carrying the party's confidential reports from one country to another.

They could also distribute the party's intensive propaganda not only among the seamen on the ships but also on an international scale. Some of the graduates of the schools could be placed in official positions in the union. The main courses for study in these schools consist in the teachings of Marx and Lenin, strike strategy, labor in politics, and similar subjects. They were taught nothing about seamanship. Yes; there were lighter moments indulged in by the students which included the singing of the school's official song. I quote this song exactly as copied from the booklet Party Organizer, which is an official organ of the Communist Party of the United States, issue of May 1937, last page:

COMRADESHIP

(Tune: Maine Stein Song)

Comradeship, we sing to you—
You give us strength and cheer!
Comradeship, because of you
We fight as one, we do not fear.

(Chorus)

So come, let's sing to unity!
Join with us, comrades all.
Sing with pride and deepest loyalty,
Love of party first of all.

To our fight, to our might,
To our mass, to our class that is spurring us!
To our aim, to our goal,
To the cause, to the C. I. that's guiding us!
To defeat our foe,
To success of our militant comradeship;
To our flag, that is red,
To the triumph of workers' dictatorship!

(Chorus)

When the school was conducted in 1937 it was thoroughly exposed by Edward Folliard, one of the Washington Post's ace reporters. However, the Communist Party again in 1939 reopened their school but conducted it more secretly. However, in spite of the party's attempts to avoid publicity, the knowledge of the operations of the 1939 school came into the possession of the seamen who were fighting communism in our merchant marine, and this whole subject is thoroughly treated in the book We Accuse. Let us see what became of some of the graduates of the party's training schools for seamen.

One of the graduates, to wit, Ferdinand Smith, is now the national secretary of the National Maritime Union. Another, Frederick Myers, is now the national organizer of that organization. Still another, Ed Bruen, is a member of the crew of the steamship Panama, of the Panama Railroad Line, and also acts as the union's delegate on that ship. Bruen graduated with such high honors from the party's training school that he was presented with a set of the works of Marx and Lenin by the Communist Party.

Perhaps this explains the fact that when Earl Browder spoke at Madison Square Garden at the Lenin memorial meeting on the day of his conviction of passport frauds he received the following wire from some of the crew of the steamship Panama:

A group of seamen aboard the steamship Panama enthusiastically greet your summation speech. The exposure of the attempted frame-up is evident despite the meager press reports. With leaders like you the American working class is assured of victory.

(Signed) SEAMAN ABOARD STEAMSHIP "PANAMA."

This telegram was quoted on the front page of the Daily Worker in its issue of January 24, 1940. I direct your attention to the fact that this message was sent to Browder from a Government-owned and operated ship whose crew are paid with Federal Government funds.

It may also be added that Bruen for a time acted as the water-front organizer of the Communist Party. Here he is, however, along with many others, serving as a member of the crew of a Government-owned and operated ship, drawing his pay from the Treasury of the United States Government, congratulating Earl Browder and indicating his allegiance not to the United States, which pays him his wages and supports and maintains him, but to the bloody rulers at Moscow.

Another graduate of the Communist Party school was Harry Stoudt, who sailed as a member of the crew of the steamship Ancon, of the Panama Railroad Co. As a member of the crew of that ship, he made a number of trips back and forth between the port of New York and the Canal Zone. While ashore in the Canal Zone, he set up an organizing committee for Canal Zone workers. In addition to being a member of the crew, Stoudt at this time carried credentials as an organizer for the east-coast longshoremen's organizing committee, which committee was set up by Harry Bridges for the purpose of trying to "take over" the east-coast longshoremen. Finally, Joseph Curran, president of the N. M. U., and Bridges agreed to send Stoudt into the Canal Zone to stay there indefinitely as an organizer for the C. I. O. maritime committee. It is well known, however, that Stoudt's activities in the Canal Zone were more concerned in colonizing for the Communist Party that they were in organizing for any trade-union movement. In a report made to Curran, chairman of the C. I. O. maritime committee, Stoudt stated that the workers in the Canal Zone could be "of great help" in the event that another maritime strike occurred on either the east or the west coast of this country. The inference drawn here is very clear, as there is only one way in which these Canal workers could be "of great help" to a maritime strike on either coast. The "great help" would be the tying up of our ships attempting to make the passage of the Canal and the refusal of the Canal workers to take these ships through the Canal locks.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes; for a question.

Mr. FADDIS. I believe the gentleman from Wisconsin is rendering a great service to the Nation and to the transport service connected with the War Department in bringing forth these facts, and I believe that this is a matter which should be investigated and if Communists are connected with the transport service in the War Department, they should be immediately thrown out.

Mr. KEEFE. I thank the gentleman.

I have called attention to these various types of seamen as indicating the character of the men supplied by the hiring halls of the National Maritime Union to the Panama Railroad Co. ships which operate for national-defense purposes. When in the name of conscience and reason are we going to wake up to the fact that this type of individual has only one purpose in mind and that is to maintain a strategic position in the maritime industry of this Nation so as to control the same not in the interests of the people of the United States but in order to foster, encourage, and carry on the propaganda dictated by Mr. Stalin and his crowd from Moscow? Why is it necessary that the sovereignty of the United States must subject itself to the whims and caprices of men of the type of Curran and Harry Bridges? Why is it that the Panama Railroad Co. must hire graduates of a Communist training school rather than seamen pledged to uphold and maintain the ideals and traditions of this Government? Can it be that this supergovernment in the merchant marine is so powerful that it can dictate the policy of the sovereign Government of the United States?

The Maritime Commission in conjunction with the Coast Guard has been operating legitimate training schools for seamen for some time past. Over $1,000,000 of Federal funds have been allocated for this purpose. The spirit back of these schools prompted the training of good American seamen who believe in the American form of government and who wish to make their livelihood by going to sea in our American merchant ships. The training courses in this school consist of splicing ropes and cables and practical seamanship in the deck department, study of engines and all engine-room machinery, and all the commissary and culinary knowledge necessary in the making of a good ship's stewards in the stewards' department. However, as courses in Leninism and Stalinism and Marxism were omitted from the curriculum of the Government training school, its graduates have found themselves "hard put" to obtain employment, due to the fact that the National Maritime Union frowns upon the Government's training-school policy and looks with favor upon the training of seamen provided by the Communist Party-maintained school. The fact is that attempts by officials of the Maritime Commission to secure employment for the graduates of their training school on the ships of the Panama Railroad Line of the War Department have been politely stymied.

The revelations of the infiltration and penetration of the Communist Party into the control of the National Maritime Union and affiliated organizations should come as a distinct shock to the Members of this body and the people of America. The present leadership of these organizations, which professing to have the interests of the seamen at heart, have for years been secretly conniving with the agents of Stalin to exercise complete control of our merchant marine, and in the event of national emergency which might involve war with the Soviet, they would be in a position by means of sabotage to completely wreck not only our merchant marine but perhaps its most valuable adjunct, the Panama Canal. The United States Government, through its direct operation of the ships of the Panama Railroad Company and its direct ownership and control of many other merchant vessels sailing throughout the world, is providing the means and vehicle for the disciples of Communism to use these ships as propaganda agencies to spread the gospel of world revolution through the ports of the world.

I believe it is high time not only in the interests of national defense but in the protection of the investment of hundreds of millions of dollars in our merchant marine that the War Department and the Maritime Commission challenge the dictation of the Communists in control of the National Maritime Union and its affiliated organizations and insist that only those who owe their loyalty and allegiance to the United States of America shall be permitted to draw salaries out of the Treasury of the United States Government for alleged services as seamen in our merchant marine. [Applause.] Despite all of the publicity that is accorded and all of the definitely proved and established facts showing the control by the Communist Party of the National Maritime Union, they bodly and brazenly continue to challenge the sovereignty of the United States Government by dictating that only those people shall have jobs as seamen who subscribe to the dictation of the Communist leaders in the National Maritime Union.

I do not for one moment mean to challenge the loyalty of the great rank and file of merchant seamen. I know from my contacts with many of them that they are good American citizens and anxious to throw off this yoke of oppression cast upon them by the Communist Party's control of their union and that all they need is leadership that will expose the facts, and it seems to me that the Government of the United States, not only for its own protection but for the protection of the thousands of loyal Americans who make their living by going to sea, should take the initiative by immediately cleaning out of our merchant marine the emissaries of communism who have no purpose in mind but to use the merchant marine in the interests of Stalin and ultimately to bring about world revolution. World conditions will not permit closing our eyes to facts and conditions so obvious.

I challenge the attention of the Nation and the Members of this body to the startling array of facts fully documented and proved as set forth in this volume, We Accuse, written by seamen in the interests of the preservation of the American merchant marine. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. RICH. The revelations of the gentleman on the floor now are such that the House of Representatives should certainly take some action, and I would like to ask about the men who join the seamen's union. Are they required to pledge their allegiance and loyalty to the American flag?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not know of any such pledge with respect to loyalty as that, but I do know this: One of the authors of this book was Mr. Ralph Emerson, who during all of last year while I served on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was the legislative counsel of the National Maritime Union, and because he refused to go along with this Communist control in that organization they threw him out of the union along with a lot of able men who were working for the benefit of the seamen themselves in the American way and who refused to surrender to the dictates of the Communist control of that organization.

Mr. RICH. In an effort to clean these Communists out of the Maritime Union, if they had such a pledge as I have indicated, and if we prohibited payment by the Federal Government to anyone who refused to take an oath of that kind, would not that be a good step forward in ridding this country of these Communists?

Mr. KEEFE. I think it would, and I am advised this afternoon by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] that this same gentleman to whom I have referred as the agent of the Communist Maritime Union, who was sent to Panama, this man Stoudt, set up an office in the Panama Canal Zone and his activities became so pernicious that the F. B. I. was called into the situation, and with the aid of the F. B. I. and the Army itself, his office was closed and his activities have been under surveillance.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from South Carolina [Mrs. CLARA G. MCMILLAN].

Mrs. CLARA G. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, in preparing the War Department appropriation bill the members of the committee have given many hours of work and study. They deserve a great deal of praise and commendation. I know these gentlemen. My husband served with them and often spoke of their conscientious attention to their duties. At least five are men who have served with our armed forces in time of war. All of them have been closely associated with military matters and have dealt with defense problems. For these reasons I think we may safely follow their leadership.

We have many and varied demands upon the public funds, but no one contends that they are of equal importance. I am not unmindful of the fact that there is need to bring Federal income and outgo into balance, either by building up the former or by reducing the latter; but I am strongly opposed to the retrenchment alternative in national-defense directions. This is no time to gamble with our security; to put off until too late those vital preparations which our military counselors urge in view of present world conditions.

We should give thanks for our fine first line of defense—the morale and the spirit of cooperation developed in our people by our great system of democracy. That spirit cannot be maintained by legislation, but it can be bolstered and strengthened by the fact that those back home know their Representatives in Congress are taking the proper precautions against any possibility of invasion.

In order to assure our own security we must become as nearly self-sufficient in a military way as it is possible to be. Training facilities for our vast reserves of manpower must be made available and utilized. Such material resources as we lack we must accumulate, create, or develop. The fact that we are not an aggressive Nation in a military sense simplifies the problem we are called upon to solve, and narrows its scope. Being concerned primarily with defensive measures, facilities for offensive operations are to be developed no more than is necessary to apply them to an ultimate defensive purpose.

Perhaps it is true that geographically we are so situated that a serious invasion by any one of the powers engaged in present world conflicts is virtually impossible. But conditions change rapidly. We have much territory to lose which is not situated within the borders of the continental United States, but which, taken by an enemy, would be as dangerous to us in his hands as it is a protection in our own. We possess islands more distant from our shore than is the island of Hango from the mainland of Finland, but of no less importance and value to us from a strategic point than was Hango to that country. We, too, like the brave and unfortunate Finns, have an isthmus to defend, which, once lost, would carry a vast proportion of our security with it.

It would be superfluous to cite more examples of this sort when the press, radio, and motion pictures bring us every day new and more striking evidence of the futility of invoking treaties, covenants, and moral sanctions against a well-prepared aggressor. He understands only one language and we must learn to speak that language well.

I believe firmly in military and naval preparedness. I have been reared, I am happy to say, in a community abounding in military and naval activities. It has been so in Charleston since the days of the American Revolution, when General Moultrie, after whom Fort Moultrie is named, repulsed an attack by a British fleet. Beside Fort Moultrie, there is the nearby historic Fort Sumter, the Army ordnance depot, the navy yard, Coast Guard units, and the Marine Corps base at Parris Island. Here also is the famous Military College of South Carolina, the Citadel, presided over by the distinguished Gen. Charles P. Summerall, former Chief of Staff. Our whole city thus may be said to be a citadel and I say to you that its people and the people of the surrounding district are imbued to the highest degree with a spirit of nationalism and patriotism.

The matter of national defense is not a partisan one. I am confident that I speak for many beside myself when I assert my earnest hope and belief that everyone will work together for a common end, not as the dupes of alarmists, nor lulled into any sense of false security, but for the protection of our declared rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. CLARA G. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I desire sincerely to compliment the gentlewoman on her very able discussion and to say that it has been a happy privilege to serve with her and to see her develop and become a worthy successor of her distinguished husband, whom we all knew and loved so well.

Mrs. CLARA G. McMILLAN. I thank the gentleman. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT]

FLOWERS TO THE LIVING

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to pay a just tribute to one of my colleagues. I refer to the gentleman from Oklahoma, Hon. JED JOHNSON. His recent successful fight in Congress in behalf of the C. C. C. and the N. Y. A. has once more demonstrated his ability as a leader and the fact that Members of this House have the utmost confidence in him and his judgment. [Applause.]

During each year we meet here on this floor with flowers piled high in front of the Speaker's stand and pay our glowing tributes to our comrades who have passed to their reward. Such a custom is altogether fitting and proper. But it occurs to me that we sometimes neglect to pay proper respect to our living colleagues.

WERE COLLEGE CHUMS

Let me say here, Mr. Chairman, that I have known my colleague from Oklahoma, Congressman JED JOHNSON, intimately for many years. Jed was born of a large family on a small farm in Texas; was reared on a short-grass farm in Cotton County, Okla. He remained home to provide a living for his aged parents while other members of his family went to college or provided homes for themselves. Later, after he was 25 years of age, JED JOHNSON started to the University of Oklahoma. Although he was without funds, he had plenty of energy, courage, natural ability, and a burning ambition to make his mark in the world. It was at Oklahoma University that I met him and where our bonds of close friendship were formed. I soon discovered that JED JOHNSON was a clean, upright, Christian gentleman, with high ideals, and also that he was a natural-born leader. I watched him make an outstanding record at the university, where he first established himself as a forceful public speaker and debater. It was while in the University of Oklahoma that he and I formed a compact to make every reasonable and honest effort to some day be elected to the United States Congress.

SERVED TWO TERMS IN STATE SENATE

I next knew Jed as a member of the State Senate of Oklahoma, to which body we were elected the same year, and where he served two terms with much distinction. His first speech in that body was made not in behalf of himself but of me. I was then a country school teacher and had been unable to find another teacher to take my place when the senate convened. Another senator scathingly denounced me for not being on hand the day the legislature convened. It was then the young senator from Cotton County took the floor in defense of his old-time college friend who was unable to be present to defend himself, and I might add that he put the old senator to shame.

It is also significant that we were both elected to Congress the same year. Therefore, I have closely observed JED JOHNSON from that day in the fall of 1915, when as a green country boy he hit the campus of the University of Oklahoma; later a State senator of State-wide influence; then a country Congressman who was placed on insignificant committees usually reserved for new Congressmen, and finally I have seen him grow to a position of power and leadership among his colleagues in Congress. Today he is not only Oklahoma's one member of the powerful Appropriations Committee but is chairman of the Interior Subcommittee on Appropriations, a position of vital concern to citizens of every congressional district in our great State. He has handled the Interior Department appropriations skillfully and well. In handling that bill he has shown, not only due regard for other Members, but a deep interest in their welfare, but through it all he has not lost the common touch.

CHAIRMAN OF SPEAKERS' BUREAU

For the past several years my colleague from the Sixth District has been chairman of the Speakers' Bureau of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, in which position he has given much of his time for the welfare of the Democratic Party. In 1934, 1936, and 1938 JED JOHNSON played a leading role in the national congressional elections. He has visited and spoken in a majority of the States of the Union and few Members of either House of Congress are in greater demand as a speaker.

Democratic Members of Congress have shown their appreciation of his consistent unselfish service to the Democratic Party in season and out, and acknowledged his ability and leadership by electing him as chairman of the Democratic Steering Committee of the House, an important policy-making committee. He has the respect and confidence of all Members of Congress, irrespective of party lines.

HAS MADE OUTSTANDING RECORD

The unblemished record of the Congressman from the Sixth District speaks for itself. His excellent record of worth-while accomplishments speak louder than extravagant but empty promises of some self-admitted statesmen. It is well known that he believes sincerely in our beloved President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and has generally supported his New Deal program. JED JOHNSON has made it plain that he believes in the objectives of the President, but, on the other hand, he is absolutely independent in thought and action. Several times he has disagreed with some of the so-called brain trusters and a few times he has not hesitated to disagree with the President. He has no respect for a rubber stamp. When the bonus bill was being considered in Congress, JED JOHNSON, along with other members of the Oklahoma delegation, voted to override the President's veto in favor of the World War veterans and their families. He has more than once voted for veterans' legislation not approved by the White House. Being a World War veteran himself and having served more than a year overseas as a buck private with the Thirty-sixth Division, where he saw considerable front-line service, I am sure that in this Congress there is no better friend of the veterans and their families, including their dependent widows and orphans, than the distinguished gentleman from the Sixth District of Oklahoma.

SERVED AS A BUCK PRIVATE IN FRONT LINES

Former service men of Oklahoma and the Nation are familiar with the fact that JED JOHNSON fathered the legislation in Congress establishing veterans' C. C. C. camps. When the committee refused to report favorably his bill he carried his fight to the White House, and after repeated efforts secured the support of the President of the United States.

There is one thing to which all who know JED JOHNSON will readily agree. He has the courage of his convictions. JED does not drift with the tide. He has a mind of his own and speaks his mind when the occasion demands. He has not hesitated to criticize the President's Budget Bureau when he felt justified in so doing, as was the case of his fight against the increased subsidy of the private ship builders, a fight for real practical economy that attracted Nation-wide attention, and also against the unreasonable reduction for the C. C. C. and N. Y. A.

WINS FIGHT FOR YOUTH

Since his successful fight recently in again leading the forces in this House to restore all the C. C. C. camps, many of which were doomed to be abandoned by the unreasonable cut attempted by the Budget and the committee, as well as his heroic efforts in restoring funds for the National Youth Administration, both of which organizations have done so much for the youth of America JED JOHNSON's outstanding ability and leadership have once more been forcefully demonstrated. I am, of course, grateful for that fight for the reason that I was scheduled to lose three C. C. C. camps in the district I represent in Congress. I know that many other Members of Congress are likewise grateful. It is significant that this country-bred Congressman from Oklahoma was selected to lead the fight for the C. C. C., as well as the N. Y. A., because of his deep and unselfish interest in youth and his ability to get the job done. It is also significant that although Oklahoma was losing nine camps, none of them scheduled to be abandoned was situated in the Sixth Congressional District, so it was not a selfish fight on his part.

LEADS SUCCESSFUL FIGHT FOR REAL ECONOMY

This signal victory came on the heels of another successful battle, a real economy drive in which my colleague played a leading role. It will be recalled that it was the same gentleman from Oklahoma who recently offered the amendment to the independent offices bill that resulted in a reduction of $56,000,000 in that one item and saved to the taxpayers in the appropriation for the next fiscal year in the subsidy to the private shipbuilders, known as the American merchant marine.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I am very glad to yield to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I congratulate the gentleman from Oklahoma for calling to the attention of the House the very able and efficient service now being rendered to this Congress by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON], and, further, if there is a Member of this Congress who is economy-minded, it is the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]. Recently, as the gentleman has indicated, almost single-handedly, he effected a saving in the Maritime Commission, in the Byrd expedition, of a sum in excess of $56,000,000, and I think that the State of Oklahoma and the Nation should be congratulated on having a Member of the ability of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] in this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I thank the gentleman from Kansas for his contribution.

As pointed out by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON], this one successful fight made by the Representative in Congress from the Sixth District will save the taxpayers of America over $56,000,000, which is sufficient to pay Jed's salary in Congress for over 600 years. [Applause.]

At the time that matter was being considered here, the gentleman from Oklahoma, Congressman JOHNSON, explained:

Considering the fact that the construction work on this building program is now a year ahead of schedule, and that Congress will still spend considerably more funds this year than last in order to fill the coffers of these private shipbuilders, here is an opportunity for Members to vote some actual economies. It would be more practical economy and show a much more humanitarian spirit to expend this $56,000,000 to aid the youth of the land or to give adequate old-age assistance to thousands of our deserving old people.

REFUSES FUNDS FOR SOUTH POLE JUNKET

When the Interior Department appropriation bill was presented to this House a few weeks ago by the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON], the chairman of the Interior Committee on Appropriations, almost shocked the House and country by announcing that his committee had refused to allow the Budget estimate of $250,000 to permit Rear Admiral Byrd and his party to extend their junket trip to the South Pole another year. He pointed out that the Byrd South Pole expedition heretofore had been given $350,000 by Congress, that they had sufficient supplies to last at least 18 months, and that there was no possible emergency or reasonable excuse that would require an extra $250,000. It will be recalled that this House showed its confidence in the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] and his committee by standing by him, and the item was not restored.

HAVE AGREED ON MANY PROBLEMS

Back in the late twenties when we were both embryonic Members of this House, Jed had some very definite ideas, not only concerning his philosophy of government, but also about things he hoped to accomplish. In most matters of legislation we have seen eye to eye. For example: We have both advocated Government participation in soil and water conservation, flood control by a series of dams on the upper tributaries of our rivers and smaller streams, as a practical method of controlling floods; smaller and better farms, diversification of farming and lower interest rates for farmers and others. Also from those early days, as the RECORD will disclose, we have joined in actively urging the extension of vocational education to all the public schools of the country so that the boys and girls would be better equipped to earn a livelihood for themselves and families. We have agreed that the problem of education of the millions of boys and girls of the country is a Nation-wide problem and that the Federal Government cannot ignore its responsibility to youth, regardless of whether they happen to reside in the crowded cities or in sparsely settled communities.

WANTS ADEQUATE OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

Moreover, I personally know that the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, was one of the first Members of Congress to advocate adequate, reasonable, and liberal old-age pensions for our millions of deserving old people. The Sixth District Congressman was one of the first Members of this body to introduce legislation along that line. Not only has he appeared before the various committees but the RECORD discloses that on the floor of the House he has repeatedly stated that old-age pensions should be paid to our needy old people; that their checks should come direct from Washington without red tape, without the semblance of a pauper's oath, and without them having to beg for such assistance.

FARM TENANCY

For more than a dozen years Congressman JOHNSON has been advocating and urging that Congress inaugurate a real, practical, and constructive program to eliminate the deplorable farm-tenant situation in our State and Nation. It was before the House steering committee that Jed finally secured an agreement between the gentleman from Texas, Hon. MARVIN JONES, chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the House, and Hon. JOHN BANKHEAD, chairman of a similar committee in the Senate, on a bill, which resulted in the compromise Jones-Bankhead farm-tenant bill. He has referred to that law as a poor compromise that does not begin to do a decent job to eradicate the farm-tenancy problems, but which is at least a forward step to that end. It was the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, who led the successful fight for funds under the Jones-Bankhead law in the last two sessions of Congress. He is the author of a bill now pending to strengthen and liberalize the present inadequate farm-tenancy program.

THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

The Sixth District Congressman has been one of the leaders in advocating rural electrification. Today the R. E. A. has extended its lines into practically all of the counties of his district. He does not hesitate to say that the present program of the R. E. A. should be greatly expanded so that every farmer would have the opportunity to enjoy the benefits of cheap electricity and every farm wife should be relieved of the drudgery and work that can be done by electric power. "There is no reason or excuse why the boys and girls who reside on the farm should not be given the same opportunity to read and study by electric lights as those who reside in our towns and cities," he says.

RATED AS GOOD CONSTITUTIONAL LAWYER

It is well known that the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, is rated as one of the best lawyers in this House. After we both completed a 3-year course at a real law school—the University of Oklahoma—he took a post-graduate course after the World War at the University of Clermont, Clermont-Ferrand, France, where he specialized in constitutional and international law. He was admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States while former President William Howard Taft was the Chief Justice.

AUTHORITY ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Three times Jed has gone as one of the representatives of this Congress to important peace conferences held in Paris, France, and in Geneva, Switzerland. Possibly no Member of either House of Congress is better informed on foreign affairs than my colleague and college friend the gentleman from the Sixth District. In these days, when international affairs are becoming more and more important, Oklahoma is proud to have one Member of this body who has so much intimate knowledge of the international situation in the various countries of the Old World.

BITTERLY OPPOSES WAR

No man in either House of Congress is more bitterly opposed to war than is my colleague from the Sixth Congressional District. Having gotten too much German gas, and having spent much time in the mud-soaked trenches of the front lines during the World War, and having seen his comrades killed and wounded by the thousands, he has first-hand knowledge that war is not a joke, but that it is all that Sherman said it was. He has repeatedly referred to war on the floor of this House as "military murder" and has reminded Members that the World War did not make the world safe for democracy or safe for anything else except too many millionaires and international bankers. Jed has probably made more speeches in Congress on taking the profits out of war than any other Member. "If we can actually eliminate war profiteering we will take a long forward step toward the elimination of future wars," he says. He has further announced that under no circumstances will he vote to send his own son, or any other American youth, to Europe to fight for ungrateful European countries. "Let us be reasonably well prepared on land, on water, and in the air; attend strictly to our own business; quit meddling in European affairs; but tell the war-mad world that if they really want a scrap with us they might try to come and get us," he recently said. "Of course," he added, "there is no danger of any nation, or combination of nations on the face of the globe, giving us any trouble or serious concern on our own soil." He strongly advocates continuing our good-neighbor policy and remaining at peace with all the world.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I have enjoyed the tribute my colleague has paid to our very worthy friend and colleague from Oklahoma, the Honorable JED JOHNSON. I have served here, of course, not quite so long as the gentleman who now has the floor, with our colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, but I have observed that in every line, for the promotion and enactment into law of liberal and constructive legislation, in the Seventy-fourth, the Seventy-fifth, and Seventy-sixth Congresses, there has been no man in the entire Congress during that time who has really rendered a better type of service to the people of the United States, to our State, and to the cause of justice than the gentleman from the Sixth District of Oklahoma. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I thank my colleague from Oklahoma.

A SEASONED LEGISLATOR

Let me say here that the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, has not only proved himself a leader among men with an excellent record of accomplishments, a progressive in his make-up, who is not satisfied with things as they are; but the fact that he is a seasoned legislator means much in any legislative body, and especially in the Congress of the United States. At this point, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of a very notable address made on March 19, 1916, by former Speaker Champ Clark at a Washington Press Club reception and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is in part as follows:

It is a high honor to be a Representative in Congress, if for only one term, and with the number of terms the honor increases in geometrical rather than in arithmetical proportion. A Member's usefulness to his country should increase in the same proportion. A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

"Poeta nascitur non fit"—a poet is born, not made—says Horace; but Congressmen—that is, useful and influential Congressmen—are made largely by experience and practice.

The old Charlotte district in Virginia knew this and kept John Randolph, of Roanoke, in the House till he became a great national figure. Then the Old Dominion sent him to the Senate and General Jackson sent him to St. Petersburg. There are sporadic cases of similar action in other districts.

It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the top-notchers.

In the second and third Congresses in which I served, Maine, with only four Members, had the Speakership and the chairmanship of the great Committees on Ways and Means, Navy, and Public Buildings and Grounds—a most remarkable circumstance, giving the Pine Tree State an influence in the House and the country out of all proportion to her population and wealth. These four men—Reed, Dingley, Boutelle, and Millikin—each served in the House 20 years or more. Other States might profit by her example.

No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things.

EXPERIENCE COUNTS IN CONGRESS

It is a well-known fact that those congressional districts which have retained their Representatives in Congress for the longest continuous terms have received not only the best services but the greatest recognition. The present able Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Alabama, Hon. W. B. BANKHEAD, has served in Congress continuously for 24 years. The majority floor leader, my good friend the gentleman from Texas, Hon. SAM RAYBURN, who resides just across the river in Texas, has served 28 years. Another gentleman from Texas, Hon. MARVIN JONES, of Amarillo, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, has served in Congress for the past 24 years. The gentleman from North Carolina, Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, had been in Congress 30 years; the gentleman from Colorado, Hon. ED. TAYLOR, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has served his constituents continuously for 32 years. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Texas, Hon. HATTON SUMNERS, of Dallas, has been in Congress 28 years. The chairman of the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Illinois, Hon. ADOLPH SABATH, is the dean of the House, having been in Congress 34 years. So there is every reason why the people should keep a trained and experienced legislator on the job as their Representative in Congress. There is no reason or excuse why any constituency should exchange experience for inexperience and a trained legislator for one who has never had any training in any legislative work.

VOTERS OF DISTRICT STAND BY JED

Mr. Chairman, I have been in the Sixth District of Oklahoma, represented by the gentleman from Oklahoma, my friend Mr. JOHNSON, many times, and he is also well and favorably known in the Third Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent. The people of the Sixth Congressional District know and understand and, therefore, love the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON. They realize that they have made him; that he speaks their language and understands and sympathizes with them in their problems. They have educated him legislatively, and they know full well that in him they have a real investment, an investment which they have demonstrated time and again that they are proud of, and which they do not propose to lose. Although some very brilliant young lawyers, mayors, businessmen, farmers, and others have opposed him in the past, I am glad to say that no opponent against the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, has ever gotten to first base in the Sixth Congresssional District. For example, in 1934 four very popular young men, including two lawyers, one mayor, and one popular member of the State legislature, announced against the Congressman, but he immediately announced that he would not return to his district but would remain at his post of duty in Washington until after the adjournment of Congress. This he did, returning to his district only 10 days before the primary, and his people showed their appreciation by returning the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, to Congress by a splendid majority.

In 1936 he again had opposition, and again he stuck to his task and refused to return to the district, and again his constituents returned him by an increased majority. In 1938, with another popular candidate pitted against him, the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, stuck to his knitting in Washington, and, although his opposition once more announced that they had the nomination "in the bag," as had been claimed in several previous campaigns, when the votes came rolling in, the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON had received over 37,000 votes to about 10,000 for his opposition. These figures speak for themselves.

The people of the Sixth Congressional District were simply once more demonstrating that they do not believe in changing horses in the middle of the stream.

Not only have his people exercised good judgment in keeping the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] in Congress, but I would like to say for the record that Jed also demonstrated rare judgment in the selection of his charming helpmate. Back in 1925 he married Miss Beatrice Luginbyhl, of Chickasha, a well-known teacher and a life-long resident of Grady County. She was educated in the Chickasha schools and was graduated from the Oklahoma College for Women. She has not only made him a devoted helpmate and companion but has been a genuine asset to him in serving the people of his district. They have three daughters and one baby son.

PREDICTS GREATER FUTURE ACCOMPLISHMENTS

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to commend the voters of the Sixth Congressional District of Oklahoma on the rare judgment they have shown in adhering to the sound advice of that great Missourian, the late Speaker Champ Clark, in keeping their Representative in Congress for seven consecutive terms. Although he has risen to his present place more rapidly than the average Congressman, his past achievements are only stepping stones to higher and better things that I feel are undoubtedly in store for him. It is generally admitted that each succeeding year he spends in Congress makes it definite and certain that his power and influence will continue to grow. It is likewise true that the investment the people have made in their Representative in Congress will pay greater dividends to the district, the State, and the Nation as the years go by. It is my sincere hope that the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, remains in Congress until he becomes the dean of this House, and that many other districts will send more men of his high caliber and sincerity of purpose as Members of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, some may wonder why I have gone into some detail to say what I have about the early life, the character, and legislative record of my friend and colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON. It is because—

A rose to the living is more,
Ere the suffering spirit has fled;
A rose to the living is more
Than sumptuous wreaths to the dead.

[Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

A PLEA FOR THE SHELTERBELT

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, at this moment I find myself very much embarrassed, in fact flabbergasted, at the speech just made by my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT], and also because of the generous remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON], and those of my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE]. I am, of course, deeply grateful for these entirely too generous remarks. I only wish I could be really worthy of it all.

Permit me to say in reply that it has been a genuine pleasure to serve these fleeting years in the Congress, not only with my colleagues from Oklahoma, but with other Members of various States who sit on both sides of this aisle. During those seven terms I have seen a goodly number of Members come and go. Some were outstanding and others not so much so. But as a rule, there is usually a reason why one is elected to this body, else he or she would not be here. During these years I have heard Members criticized severely. In fact, I have not hesitated to differ violently with Members, but let me say that as a rule, I have met no higher type of citizens anywhere than those Members who serve in these Halls of Congress.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. A moment ago I made the remark that the gentleman was economy-minded, which is true, but is it not a fact that the gentleman from Oklahoma believes in placing Federal money where it will best serve the public interest, such as the C. C. C., the N. Y. A., and other useful agencies of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I certainly do. I will say in passing that I congratulate this committee on the fine work it has done. It has reduced the total of this bill $67,000,000 below the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget. It is also significant that in reducing this estimate $67,000,000 it has reduced it approximately the same amount as was added to the bill a few days ago in order to maintain the C. C. C. on the present strength and also to maintain the National Youth Administration as it is now operating. So I congratulate the committee on the good work it has done. I sincerely wish it had made further reductions, which I feel could have been done.

I have asked the indulgence of the Committee at this time, Mr. Chairman, to discuss for a few moments out of order, concerning another important subject that I feel is of vital concern to Members of Congress and the country. I desire to call attention of Members at this time to what is called the shelterbelt. A few years ago, when the shelterbelt program was inaugurated in the country, we thought of it as a belt of trees 50 miles wide that, when planted, would extend entirely through the United States from Canada to the Gulf. In fact, that idea was first promulgated and announced. Some of us seriously objected to that suggestion, that, if carried out, would have confined the planting of trees to such a limited area; and because of that objection Congress has made it plain to the Forest Service that farmers residing in the Plains States, regardless of whether they happen to be situated within the so-called shelterbelt area, are entitled to have shelterbelt trees. The Forest Service has done a marvelous job with this shelterbelt program. [Applause.]

The shelterbelt tree-planting project in the Great Plains, now known as the Prairie States forestry project, was conceived by our great President. This has been a wonderful thing for the people of Oklahoma and others of the Plains States. The planting work was initiated in the spring of 1935. Only a few miles of planting was done that year, but now, in my State, over 20,000,000 trees have been planted on over 3,400 farms, many of which had heretofore had no trees whatever. Planting to date has provided over 2,000 miles of shelterbelts in Oklahoma. In all, more than 125 million trees have been planted in 11,000 miles of shelterbelts on some 17,000 farms in the six Plains States which, of course, includes Oklahoma.

Probably every farming country has its draw-backs. One of our serious draw-backs is wind. Average wind velocities in the Great Plains region are higher than anywhere else in the country, except a few coastal areas. Seed newly planted in the spring often is blown out of the ground, and sometimes young crops are blasted and destroyed by the soil drifting along the surface. Frequently farmers plant two or three times in order to start a crop. This is costly, and the shorter growing season reduces the amount of crop produced. Farmers tell me that shelterbelts planted only three or four years ago are already protecting their land and crops from wind to a remarkable extent.

These shelterbelts not only provide protection to lands and crops, but also protection to livestock and to man himself. They provide protection and food for birds and other wildlife, and they yield a continuing supply of fence posts and fuel wood for the farm, and at times for sale to bring in some extra cash.

I doubt whether any governmental undertaking was ever begun under a darker cloud than hovered over the shelterbelt. It was said the trees would not grow. There were many skeptics. The project was ridiculed. But the work has gone forward quietly, and to me the fact that it is so widely accepted by the farmers themselves, that more applications for plantings are received by the Forest Service than can be planted, convinces me more than anything else that the work is tremendously valuable.

Not only is this work in itself of great value to the farmers and of general benefit to agriculture, but it has also been of great aid in meeting the unemployment problem in the farming areas. In my State it has provided 20,000 man-months of employment, and in all the States around one hundred and forty-two thousand.

Let me say also, this program is not at all a "Santa Claus" proposition. The Forest Service raises the seedlings and plants them in the belts, because the right kind of trees, properly planted, are the foundation of successful tree establishment in that prairie country. But the farmer is a full partner in the enterprise. He must prepare the land for planting in accordance with the directions of the foresters, and he must furnish the fencing material to enclose the plantation. He must intensively cultivate the trees for several years, protect them from rabbits and insects, and otherwise give them the care that trees demand in this region. In the truest sense of the word, the Federal Government helps the farmer to establish his shelterbelt, helps him because it has an organization of trained foresters capable of rendering that service and making the undertaking a success. And not only do the farmers participate in the work, but counties and municipalities furnish assistance in many ways. Without disparaging in the least the great work which the Forest Service is doing in connection with the national forests and private timberlands, in my opinion one of the most fertile fields for service in this country which lies before it is the application of its forestry science to the rehabilitation of the Great Plains region.

In Oklahoma the project operates 2 nurseries on land leased by the Government. The project as a whole operates a total of 14 nurseries.

In the 5 years of operation, there has been expended $8,276,000. This sum is insignificant in view of the benefits to be derived from such an undertaking.

People who visit these plantings are astonished at the success of the work and the growth they have made. The papers last fall published widely the enthusiasm of our First Lady, Mrs. Roosevelt, when she visited some of the plantings in Kansas and talked to the farmers and their wives. I wish she might also have come to Oklahoma and seen the excellent work there. [Applause.]

I am told that the first questions asked of our foresters when they visit Europe are about this project, which is internationally known.

This shelterbelt program has the wholehearted support of people in every walk of life in the Plains region. Agriculturists, business interests, and farmers are all agreed that it is a sound and intelligent approach toward the solution of some of the basic ills which afflict this great food and fiber-producing region.

Unfortunately the Prairie States forestry project and its shelterbelt planting program have no stability as a part of the agricultural program in this vitally important agricultural region. It has been financed solely through allocation of relief funds. It is particularly adapted to the use of relief labor because most of the work must be performed by hand; but because of the technical and scientific nature of the work, operation solely with relief funds, because of the limitations surrounding their use, imposes almost insurmountable difficulties.

These difficulties arise because the Emergency Relief Act sets up certain restrictions based on the assumption that the projects will be sponsored and partly financed by some other agency with money for that purpose. Since the shelterbelt planting program is a Federal undertaking and there is no direct appropriation for it, naturally there is no sponsor's money available. To be successful the project must have a stable organization of trained technicians, it must have equipment to work with, and money for office rent, nursery leases, and the many other things which are required of an organization raising and planting some 40,000,000 trees a year.

In the first place, I do not think it is right to try to finance this program purely with relief money. It is an agricultural program vital to the farming interests of that country and ought to be treated as such and put on a permanent basis. It ought to have a regular appropriation to supplement the allotment of W. P. A. funds so that it can at least enjoy the advantage of the ordinary W. P. A. project. But if it is continued next year as an emergency project, then some provision must be made in the W. P. A. Appropriation Act to allow it to function effectively and economically and in the best interests of the agricultural industry which it is designed to serve. There is a strong and rapidly growing appreciation of what this shelterbelt planting program means to the welfare of that Great Plains section. It would be folly to strangle it to death with restrictions which preclude its continuance.

The W. P. A. itself is not at fault in this matter. The W. P. A. believes this is a most constructive project, and that the program is leaving something on the ground which will be of incalculable benefit.

My colleagues, it is difficult to put into words some of the things that trees mean to the people of the Plains—a people courageously struggling against the vicissitudes of drought and all the other evils which have beset agriculture. Notwithstanding all the material benefits of trees, to me one of the most important aspects of this great tree-planting work is its effect on the morale and spirit of my people. People love trees. They want trees and are entitled to have them. And nowhere is the great necessity for trees as a part of the home and as a part of the homeland more keenly felt than by the people of the Plains, of which Oklahoma is an important part.

Mr. HOUSTON and Mr. MASSINGALE rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas first.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to again congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma for bringing to the attention of the House, as he always does, an intelligent discussion of a worth-while subject. I am very much in favor of this shelterbelt project. I remember a few years ago when we first brought this to the attention of the House there was a lot of opposition to it, especially from the farmers in the West. Throughout the State of Kansas, in the Dust Bowl area, especially where this shelterbelt has been put into effect in recent years, the farmers are asking for it—not one but thousands of them. We have found that where those trees have been put in and allowed to grow in 3 or 4 years it has acted as a very effective windbreak. The wheat back of that grows better than it did before, and the soil remains on the ground instead of blowing away. I thank the gentleman for bringing this to the attention of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for his usual valuable contribution. Let me add that, in my judgment, this shelterbelt project ought to be on a permanent basis. The reason I have brought this to the attention of the Members of Congress now is the fact that, as the Members know, funds to maintain the shelterbelt are now paid out of relief funds.

It is on a very unsatisfactory basis as a permanent program. It is impossible, of course, for the Forest Service to know how much, if any, funds they will receive out of relief funds for the shelterbelt program for the next fiscal year. I have reason to believe that unless this shelterbelt is put on a permanent basis, and unless the Forest Service knows approximately what it may be able to spend for the shelterbelt program from year to year, that they really have no desire to continue it under present unsatisfactory conditions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am, of course, pleased to yield to my distinguished colleague from the Seventh District of Oklahoma, who is one of the ablest Members in this body, and who is in full sympathy with this program, I am sure.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I just wanted to supplement the statement of the gentleman about the practical value of the tree-planting business in western Oklahoma, where both he and I reside. I have on my desk in my office a cross section of a tree that will be 5 years old this fall. It was planted out on the level prairie, where, in the early days, no tree growths of any kind were observed except occasionally along a winding creek, where there were cottonwood trees growing. This tree, a sample of which was sent to me about 2 weeks ago, is large enough in circumference and was so used that a post for fence construction was cut out of the tree, and that made two posts, because it was large enough to be split in two and made two first-class fence posts.

That shows the rapidity with which these forests can be grown. I take great pleasure when I am at home, especially in the summertime when it is hot and the wind is blowing, in driving down these lanes which are lined with these new forest growths, and I certainly appreciate the service they are rendering. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank my colleague from Oklahoma. I will add that this splendid program was started in western Oklahoma, in the district so ably represented by the gentleman from the Seventh Congressional District, so far as our State is concerned.

Only a few years ago I was passing through the Seventh District and saw those trees and the remarkable growth they had made. I saw also the remarkable change in sentiment of the people with reference to this shelterbelt program. I have here before me about a dozen clippings—editorials from some of the leading newspapers in Oklahoma, Kansas, and Nebraska. I find that several of the leading newspapers of these three States which had actively opposed the shelterbelt program in the beginning are now very much impressed with the program and are proclaiming the shelterbelt program as one of the outstanding accomplishments of this administration.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska who is very much interested in this program.

Mr. STEFAN. I expect to follow the gentleman briefly on the subject in a few moments and I was wondering whether or not he would care to discuss the possibility of some amendment that would make this program permanent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am very glad the gentleman has raised that question. Let me say that I have been working on such an amendment. I have discussed the matter with the Forest Service. I am told that such amendment can be offered, similar to the amendment that was offered in the last Congress to the relief bill making an exception to the Indian Service. I am further advised that if such an amendment is adopted by the Congress it can be placed on a permanent basis. I will say to the gentleman that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment for that purpose.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. Would the gentleman tell us the character of the trees that were planted in this shelterbelt area?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is a very interesting matter. It is my understanding that early in the shelterbelt program the Forest Service started with two or three varieties of trees. In some areas they were of the opinion that nothing but cedar trees, for example, would grow, but they found that in those same areas many other varieties actually grew just as well or perhaps better. In western Oklahoma they are growing not only cedar trees but black locusts, cottonwood, black walnut, Chinese elms, poplar, Osage orange, and several drought-resistant varieties, and they have grown them with remarkable success.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, it does me good to hear my colleague from Oklahoma so tremendously interested in trees, a subject with which I have probably bored you for several years. I was interested in the gentleman's statement regarding the place where this tree planting was conceived. I will not argue with him regarding that except I wish to call his attention to the fact that tree planting was conceived in my State of Nebraska by the late J. Sterling Morton, once Secretary of Agriculture. He was father of Arbor Day, tree-planting day, which should be a national holiday.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I will ask my colleague from Idaho to let me proceed for a few minutes before asking me to yield.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Oklahoma plans to offer an amendment to make this tree-planting program permanent. It should be permanent. It is no longer the dream of its originators, a shelterbelt around the country; it is now farm forestry; and the farmers want it continued permanently because it has been successful. It is one of the most valuable things that has been done in my State. The trees are growing at least 75 percent successfully. There are some shelterbelts where farmers are harvesting fruit from the shelterbelt. Covies of quail are coming back to my State. Once they had disappeared entirely. They are now coming back. Shelterbelts are replacing snow fences in some parts of my State. Shelterbelts in my State are making it possible for farmers who wish to sell to get more money for their farms just because they have these trees on it.

The people in this western country no longer think of the shelterbelt as you and I did when first those seedlings were planted in the sand, so small they could hardly be seen. They have grown until today they stand 30 and 40 feet tall.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes; gladly.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Nebraska is quite correct in his statement about the origin of the tree-planting idea and Arbor Day. It sprang up in Nebraska, but it extended North as well as South, and in my State of South Dakota for a number of years we have had a tree bounty. My attention was called to it by an item I just read this morning by the State secretary of agriculture calling attention to the bounty that has been offered for a great many years whereby farmers over a period of 10 years receive a bounty of $5 per acre. I thank the gentleman for calling attention to the movement that has spread throughout the West, and I hope all the Members present today will lend their support to what has been done in farm forestry.

Mr. STEFAN. I thank the gentleman from South Dakota. He has always supported this program.

In extending my remarks, I will say something about why this program should be made permanent through an amendment which I hope will be offered by my colleague from Oklahoma; present just a few statements of fact indicating why it should be made permanent. You know, it has been done with relief money. Since 1935 we have spent approximately $2,000,000 of your relief money for these shelterbelts. They have been paid for, and they have been paid back, I think, 10 or 15 times in value to the farms and in value to the districts.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. May I ask the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska if there is a State program in Nebraska for county and community forests?

Mr. STEFAN. We have all kinds of programs in Nebraska for tree planting. The Omaha Herald is now coordinating the many forces in our State—the American Legion, the American Legion Auxiliary, the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts, and others. The school children in the State of Nebraska every Arbor Day go out into the highways and byways and plant trees in every nook and corner of the State. Nebraska is becoming a more wonderful State every day. Farms which formerly grew no trees are growing them today as a result of this program.

Mr. REED of New York. I am glad to know that the gentleman is enlisting the cooperation of the school system, because not only in this country but in other countries it has been found to be most effective. They are teaching the children the love of trees and tree culture.

Mr. STEFAN. May I say to the gentleman from New York that ever since Mr. J. Sterling Morton conceived the idea of tree planting Arbor Day in Nebraska has been a holiday. The schools are dismissed, and, with the aid of the American Legion and others, the school children leave the schools with shrubbery and trees, which they plant. It is becoming a wonderful program in Nebraska. I wish that Arbor Day could be made a national holiday. I hope the amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma will be agreed to. It will not require the expenditure of additional money.

Mr. REED of New York. May I remind the gentleman of something with which I presume he is familiar? Many years ago they organized a forest program for the farms in Switzerland, and today there is hardly a community or farm there that has not its own forest. They are practically paying their taxes from income derived from those trees.

Mr. STEFAN. Yes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] and I traveled in Europe last year. We found the roads everywhere we went bordered with trees of all kinds, especially fruit trees, from which wonderful fruit was harvested. Trees planted in the Prairie States will bring back to the people of America a hundred times the amount of money invested in the planting of those trees.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. May I mention the fact that in connection with the homestead law, and in connection with the preemption law when the State of Nebraska, the State of Kansas, and other Western States were settled, we had a tree claim. I am wondering what became of that program.

Mr. STEFAN. I remember that. Do you remember what happened to those tree claims? The trees were planted, but the younger generation came along and cut down trees which required 50 or 60 years to grow. Only God can make a tree, but you and I can destroy it. We have destroyed many wonderful trees in the West which were planted by your father and mine. That is what happened to the trees in the West.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. In passing through the Dakotas you see some of those wonderful groves that were planted under Government regulations.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman is right, and I thank him for his contribution. I hope that when an amendment is offered to make tree planting in the Prairie States a permanent program it will receive the support of all the Members because it will not require the expenditure of one penny more. I feel that every dollar expended from these relief appropriations for the planting of trees will bring back to us, at lease $100 in value.
